

Dos Rios: The Many Facets of a Natural Gem

By ERIC CAINE, The Valley Citizen

"It looks like a bunch of weeds," said David Froba when he pulled over to look at an early-stage restoration project near the confluence of the Tuolumne, San Joaquin and Stanislaus Rivers, just west of Modesto.

The "weeds" may not be as attractive as the ducks, geese, and songbirds that capture the attention of nature lovers when they visit the nearby San Joaquin River National Wildlife Refuge, but they're just as necessary to the ongoing restoration of the riparian and floodplain habitat along the rivers.

Last Friday, Froba and several fellow members of the Stanislaus Audubon Society Board of Directors visited a restricted portion of the Dos Rios Ranch, which is slated to become California's newest State Park. Coupled with the adjacent national wildlife refuge, the new park will be part of one of the largest floodplain and riparian restorations in the state. Much of the restoration has been managed by River Partners, a detail-obsessed organization dedicated to bringing life and sustainability back to the state's rivers, floodplains, and riparian forests.

Mugwort, gum plant, native sunflowers, and creeping wild rye are among several components of the weedy understory of plants necessary to attract and sustain formerly abundant Valley birds like the Least Bell's Vireo, which appeared on the wildlife refuge in 2005 after a decades-long absence from the San Joaquin Valley. Today, with the planting of the appropriate understory and hundreds of thousands of cottonwoods, willows, box elder and oaks, local nature lovers are hopeful that Yellow-billed Cuckoos, a threatened species throughout the west, will find their way back to the river habitat they found attractive for nesting as late as the 1960s.

The San Joaquin River National Wildlife Refuge has already been a major factor in the recovery of the Aleutian Cackling Goose, a winter visitor whose numbers had dropped to under six hundred in the 1980s. Thanks to restoration work by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, National Audubon Society and organizations like River Partners, today's population of the once-endangered goose numbers over 200,000.

Another endangered species, the Riparian Brush Rabbit, is so sensitive that visitors to restricted portions of its small territory must bathe their shoes in a dilute bleach mixture to prevent tracking in RHDV2, a highly contagious and often fatal disease that only recently was discovered on the refuge. The tiny rabbits also require a precise mix of over- and understory vegetation to insure their recovery.

With the ongoing purchase and restoration of farmland along the rivers, River Partners is also working to bring back the floodplain that once served as nature's way of controlling the rivers during high water flooding events.

"We want it to be flooded," said River Partners' Restoration Ecologist Haley Mirts, pointing to slightly higher ground along a section of the Dos Rios where an orchard still produces almonds.

Ultimately, that section of land will become a nursery for migrating juvenile salmon as they return from upriver spawning grounds, giving them space to mature and gain strength while safe from predators. The floodplain will mark a return to natural flood control and also serve an important role in groundwater recharge, a crucial need as Valley residents confront depleted aquifers, climate change, and reduced water allotments for lawns and gardens.

"We have one year, four year, and five-and-a-half year successional plantings," said Mirts, as she explained the biological strategy for restoring the natural diversity that once typified river habitats throughout the state. Ultimately, the mix of native plants, trees, birds and mammals will provide a living library of nature, even while providing practical benefits like flood control, preservation of endangered species, and recreation.

Farmworkers March into Modesto on 335 Mile Journey for Justice

Farmworker marchers arrived in Modesto on August 19 on their 24-day March to the California state capitol for the Governor's signature. They are demanding that Governor Newsom sign the CA Ag. Labor Voting Choice Act AB2183.

This critical bill would give more choices to farm workers so they can vote free from intimidation. Farmworkers would be able to vote in secret whenever and wherever they feel safe. Farmworkers specifically chose to end their march on Friday, August 26 - which Governor Newsom last year declared "California Farmworker Day."

MAPS fall schedule

MAPS offers free, informative, and engaging community science programs, Approximately monthly on Fridays in MJC West Campus Sierra Hall 132 at 7:30 pm (also at 4 pm on 9/30/22).*

Friday, Sept. 30: *Two presentations - 4 pm (all ages), 7:30 pm (Jr. High and up). A MAPS, GVM, and SCOE production. Taormina (Tara) Lepore, Ph.D. candidate, UC Museum of Paleontology. Outstanding Graduate Student Instructor Award – 2021. Why Do We Love Dinosaurs So Much? Connecting Our Planet's Past to Our Present. Tara will discuss 1. Evidence gleaned from fossilized T. rex droppings and dinosaur trackways 2. What makes a dinosaur a dinosaur 3. Why we are fascinated by dinos. A JURASSIC FESTIVAL IN MODESTO will be held in the Great Valley Museum Lobby from 5 pm until 7 pm with dino contests. Dinosaur models to be on display. More at <http://taorminalepore.com/>

Friday, Oct. 28, 2022: Anna Nierenberg, Assistant Professor of Astrophysics, UC Merced, <https://annanierenberg.com/>. Anna will discuss the Potential and Results from the Webb Telescope and her studies of dark matter. <https://annanierenberg.com/>

Friday, Nov. 18: Nick Stong, Monterey Bay Aquarium, Manager of Public Programs.

The Amazing Life of the Western Monarch Butterfly. A MAPS, GVM and SCOE production. *A second presentation at 4 pm might be added. An art contest for K-16 students will be held prior to this event. <https://www.linkedin.com/in/nick-stong-40a61587>

Friday, Dec. 9: Dr. Jim DeKloe, Professor of Biological Sciences and Biotechnology, serves as the director and founder of the Industrial Biotechnology program at Solano College. Microbes, Medicine, and Money: Biomanufacturing in the 21st Century. An introduction to the field of biomanufacturing, a description of the national state of training in biotechnology and biomanufacturing, <http://www.solano.edu/biotech/educators.html>

MAPS is grateful to MJC, the MJC Foundation, SCOE, the Modesto Teachers Assn. (MTA) and the Great Valley Museum (GVM) for generous support.

MJC Science Colloquium Fall 2022 Schedule

Wednesdays 3:15 - 4:15 pm in Science Community Center, Room 115, West Campus. We are back for IN PERSON talks for the first time since March 2020! Talks will also be recorded for the Science Colloquium's YouTube site for later viewing.

Sept. 14: Denise Godbout-Avant, Stanislaus County Master Gardener. All About Bees

Bees are fascinating insects and vital agricultural pollinators. Learn about their anatomy, life stages, types of bees and habits, why they are in trouble and how we can help.

Sept. 28: Christine Gemperle, Almond Farmer, Gemperle Orchards. Growing Almonds and Finding Balance in the Face of Challenges Posed by Climate Change. California's multibillion-dollar almond industry must adapt to climate change. Christine, a leader in these efforts, will discuss how her practices enrich soils naturally, save water, and sequester carbon.

Oct. 12: Heidi Fernandez Meyer, Professor of Mathematics, Modesto Junior College. John Napier: His Life and Early Calculating Devices. Sixteenth-century Scottish mathematician, scientist, and inventor, John Napier is best known for his invention of logarithms and for his supposed sorcerous powers. Philosopher David Hume called Napier "the greatest man his country ever produced," and mathematician Laplace said Napier had "doubled the life of the astronomer" by making calculations easier. You will hear stories of Napier's life and learn to use two of his beautifully simple calculating devices: Napier's Rods and his Location Arithmetic."

Oct. 26: Emma Stein, former MJC student (who has been doing graduate research in Wales). Subject: Marine Crab Behavior.

Nov. 09: Tom Crain, NASA Ambassador. Here Comes the Sun. The Sun's origin, its longevity on the main sequence of stellar life, and what will be a very dramatic ending will be discussed. Breathtaking photos and videos from telescope observatories focused on the Sun, providing us with 24/7 coverage of what is happening, will be included.

Scholarships awarded by SCF

Stanislaus Community Foundation (SCF) is pleased to share that $305,850 has been awarded to 178 local students for the 2022-2023 school year. Since its inception in 2002, SCF has distributed more than $2 million on behalf of local individuals, families, companies, and schools.

"Stanislaus Community Foundation is proud to support the academic goals of our local students," said Marian Kaanon, CEO of Stanislaus Community Foundation. "They are the future of this county, and an investment in them is an investment in Stanislaus."

This year, 94 percent of first-time awardees were low income – signaling a great need for scholarships for students in our community.

Javier Rodriguez, a local student, said, "I graduated from Ceres High School in 2013 and received a scholarship from the Stanislaus Community Foundation to pursue my undergraduate degree at UC Davis. I obtained my bachelor's degree in Neurobiology, Physiology, and Behavior in 2018 and was motivated to pursue medicine to help close the health disparities seen in the Central Valley. Scholarships truly make a difference and allow students from disadvantaged backgrounds like me to have an opportunity to be successful."

Anyone interested in opening a scholarship fund to support Stanislaus County students can contact Melissa Van Diepen, Chief Philanthropy Officer at mvandiepen@stanislauscf.org or by calling 209.576.1608 x104.

Help with an MJC Cleanup!

The Young Adults Fighting Tobacco coalition (YAFT), along with Stanislaus CJAN and the Sierra Club, will run a cleanup on the East Campus of Modesto Junior College to combat the negative environmental effects generated by the tobacco industry. At YAFT, we work with rural communities to address the impacts of Big Tobacco on our health and our environment.

The MJC Cleanup will be held on Saturday, September 10, 2022 from 10 am-12:30 pm.

Meeting Location: East Campus, 435 College Ave, Modesto, CA 95350.

Snacks, drinks, and cleaning equipment will be provided. Volunteers will also receive free lunch and a chance to win gift cards!

If you have any questions, please email us at yaft@health-collaborative.org

Further information and specific details will be emailed to all volunteers the week before the cleanup. ACTION: To help, register here.

Linda Scheller's Wind and Children: Powerful Poetics from the Classroom

By TOM PORTWOOD

Each school day for thirty-six years, the children walked into now-retired Ceres teacher Linda Scheller's fifth-grade classroom, eager to learn but "often burdened by grinding poverty and difficult family situations at home."

"A lot of my students' families were very, very poor," Ms. Scheller recounted recently when interviewed about her powerful new collection of poetry, Wind and Children (Main Street Rag Publishing Company, www.MainStreetRag.com), which focuses on her lengthy teaching career and the lives of the children she touched as "mother of thousands."

"Their families worked very hard, and their housing situations were often insecure, to put it mildly," she continued. "Many of the parents worked in the fields and orchards of the Valley – a lot of work in agriculture. If someone got a job in a cannery, that was great. That was a much better-paying job."

"But more than likely they were out in the sun, working the fields, pruning the fruit trees – doing all the back-breaking work that goes into agriculture when you are either a migrant laborer or have recently arrived in this country and need to find work to support your family – say, mucking around in a feedlot, and working for the person who owns that dairy."

"One of the reasons I wrote this book and feel so strongly about getting it into the world is that I believe a lot of Americans are unaware of the extent of childhood poverty that exists in this country. It's just appalling."

In this splendid book, dedicated "...with love and gratitude to the students, teachers, and staff with whom I worked and learned," Ms. Scheller's poems bring into razor-sharp detail the world in which her students struggled to survive conveyed in strong, beautifully accessible language. These are poems that only a caring, sensitive teacher could have written, and the portrayals she shares of her students and their often tragic lives are extraordinarily gripping. "Olivero Road" begins:

carries a rifle beside his flowering pride...
one of my ex-students gone out to kill birds and cats replace the unseen enemy that holds him down...*

The second poem in Wind and Children is "The Examination" in which the speaker's fifth graders seem haunted by "the premonition of age...coating their wings."

In "The Teacher" and other deftly observant poems, Ms. Scheller's work is almost cinematic:

The grades she issues are written with spittle, and at midnight she prays for the power to move small fates to the other side of town. Obscenities are scratched into desk tops, and alms of secondhand toys line the shelves.

Of course, it was these difficult, disheartening circumstances she encountered daily that energized Ms. Scheller as a teacher. She instinctively knew she was making a difference the minute she saw the faces of her students as they scrambled for their desks at first bell. She knew that classroom in Ceres was where she was meant to be.

"I loved teaching," Ms. Scheller fondly remembers, "I really loved it. I couldn't wait. Every morning I'd pop out of bed and get to school hours early because I wanted to be really ready and get everything situated. I loved the creativity that the job demanded. I loved sharing that excitement with the kids and piquing their curiosity and helping them find their strengths."

"I had students who came from Mexico and Central America and, of course, many White kids. But I also had students who came from Fiji and Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos, Ukraine, and Africa. It was marvelous to be amongst such diversity."

"I also loved being part of this human network and finding out more about humanity and our connection to one another – how we can help each other and relate to and learn from each other. And appreciate that we are all different in a lot of ways, and how that can be a source of real delight."

Ms. Scheller retired from teaching five years ago (though she continues to work as hard and creatively as ever on a variety of projects (<https://thevalleycitizen.com/community-profile-award-winning-poet-kcbp-radio-programmer-linda-scheller/>)) but still holds passionate views about the current state of the educational system and the children and families that system is meant to serve.

"Right now teachers are leaving in droves. The pandemic has certainly been very challenging and difficult, but there had been so many problems before that. I left because I got really tired of the overemphasis on data which didn't take into account the circumstances of individual schools and the barriers so many students faced."

"We hear talk about 'bad' or poorly performing schools. Usually, what we are really talking about are impoverished, marginalized communities of color and all the systemic racism that has led those communities into being thus undermined. I hear people saying, 'Oh, the schools should be teaching critical thinking or teaching kids how to be happy.' Of course, we do teach critical thinking and kindness, but I think what many people don't realize is that when children are hungry, when they are homeless or living in a violent neighborhood, when they are afraid for their lives and their families are in dire straits, then learning anything while trying to survive becomes very difficult."

"I really hope that people can take a comprehensive view and be more compassionate, and hopefully be more proactive in insisting that we do a better job of providing for children and their families and taking care of people in our midst."

Citing Wallace Stevens, Diane Wakoski, and Gerard Manley Hopkins as early influences, among others, while admiring the work of contemporary poets Patricia Smith, Margaret Atwood, and Troy Jollimore, Ms. Scheller follows a strict regimen in her own work as a writer and poet.

"I write something or at least revise something every day," she explained. "I may not complete a piece or start something new every day, but I also do a lot of submissions. In the process of submitting my work, I scrutinize my writing and frequently will make small changes. The potential for revision is always there. Sometimes I use writing prompts, but not that often. For me – especially now that I'm retired and have more time to pursue my own interests, I'll try to challenge myself with form. For example, I'll try and have the lines all the same length, but at the same time I'm trying to maintain a musicality and pay attention to diction, meter, alliteration and assonance. I like working within those kinds of constraints."

"Strangely, I find that it's both more liberating and productive. I want to have some parameters, to make some choices and then have to fit ideas and images into those parameters. That, to me, is much more exciting. I enjoy crafting poems."

In addition to standing as a testament to the hardships and injustices she witnessed as a teacher of marginalized fifth-graders in the Valley, Wind and Children goes beyond the school grounds as Ms. Scheller writes – often despairingly – of California's tortured landscapes, of our "era of deforestation and burning" where "plants wither and rivers disappear." These images of anguish and sterility are indeed stark and sobering – and a call to action for all concerned.

But Wind and Children ends on a high note. In the collection's final poem, "Insert joy here," Ms. Scheller, always "a lover of wind and clouds," practically cries out at the skies:

*This morning this glorious morning
it rained*

Modesto artist Henrietta Sparkman created the beautiful artwork for the cover of Wind and Children. The book is exceptional, by one of our area's leading poets, and I highly recommend reading it.

New Resources from Statistics in Schools Bring Census Data to the Classroom

By SHANNAN ALSTON and ADAM GRUNDY,
United States Census Bureau

Ever wonder how many amusement parks are in your state? If you live in Florida, it's 53. Or how many businesses are in your county? In Sussex County, Delaware, for example, 6,074 have paid employees.

These answers come from the U.S. Census Bureau's County Business Patterns but you'll find many more in easy-to-use classroom resources and activities created by the Census Bureau's Statistics in Schools (SIS) program.

As teachers across the nation begin mapping out lesson plans, they can incorporate new and updated SIS resources in core subjects like: Math, English, History, Geography, and Sociology, to introduce students to Census Bureau data and how to use them in the real world.

The Value of Statistics in Schools

"From using SIS charts, graphs, and maps...to teaching students how to read graphic information, (teachers) are always able to find value in our materials no matter what subject they teach or what field of education they're in," said Kimberley Glascoe, a SIS marketing specialist.

For example, educators can use the materials and games to help students learn while having fun playing SIS trivia games like Kahoot! And "Population Bracketology" and participating in other activities using Census Bureau "Fun Facts" handouts to pave the way.

"One of the goals of the SIS program is to show teachers that the word 'statistics' is not something that is only taught in high school or in math class," said Vicki Glasier, chief of the Statistics in Schools Branch. "Elementary and middle school teachers can use SIS resources to supplement what they are teaching across all grades and subjects to help students understand the importance of data and build on their statistical literacy from an early age."

Newest SIS Resources

Among new SIS lessons, warm-up activities and interactive data journeys now available:

Fun Facts. From the value of fireworks imported to the United States to the number of businesses that make barbecue grills, the Census Bureau's "Fun Facts" about 4th of July has the answers. We have fun nuggets about Hispanic Heritage Month, Constitution Day, and Back To School, too. These resources are entertaining and colorful, and easy to download for use in the classroom.

Interactive Maps. After diving into some business, demographic, and population data, students and teachers alike may enjoy exploring new interactive State Facts for Students display. Students can click on their state or one of the other 49 states (plus Washington D.C., Puerto Rico, Guam, Northern Mariana Islands, U.S. Virgin Islands, or American Samoa) to learn about Census Bureau data available at the state level. Students may be amazed to learn things like how their state's population compares to others, how workers in their state commute or how many households have smartphones.

Play Statistics in Schools Games on Kahoot! SIS has an assortment of nine Kahoot! U.S. Census Bureau Data games. These games highlight Census Bureau statistics on holidays, anniversaries and observances of America's diverse populations. One new game to be released later this month, "From Diplomas to Degrees: Exploring U.S. Education Statistics," tests your knowledge by asking questions like: Has the percentage of adults who completed high school in the last 10 years increased or decreased? What was the average annual salary of workers with a bachelor's degree?

SIS Ambassador Program

Through the SIS Ambassador program, a community of teachers, librarians and others in the education field can promote SIS activities and participate in select SIS virtual events and special initiatives.

Collaborating with other educators, librarians and the Census Bureau, the current 72 SIS ambassadors devise innovative ways to bridge the gap between data and the real world and boost statistical literacy of K-12 students nationwide.

SIS ambassadors can receive a digital badge and other national recognition for their efforts spreading the word about the value of census data.

"We are always looking for new and innovative ideas and ways to work with teachers," Glasier said. "In addition to new resources and ideas like virtual field trips and connecting students to Census experts virtually, we are keeping a list of new subject areas we would like to create content for, including economics."

Adam Grundy is a supervisory statistician in the Census Bureau's Economic Management Division. Shannan Alston is a survey statistician in the Economic Management Division.

Residential long-term care workers are underpaid and at high risk during the pandemic

From the Economic Policy Institute

Workers in residential long-term care facilities face low pay and poor working conditions, according to a new EPI report examining employment levels, demographics, compensation, poverty rates, and unionization rates of these workers.

Among residential long-term care workers—which consist of workers in nursing homes and residential care facility industries—the report finds:

- A vast majority (80.9%) are women.
- A disproportionate number are Black women (22.4%) and immigrant women (12.8%).
- $15.22 is the median hourly pay—below the U.S. median hourly wage of $20.07.
- 7.2% live in poverty—higher than the poverty rate for all workers (5.3%).
- 6.9% are covered by a union contract—a lower rate than the overall workforce (11.9%).

In addition to facing low wages, residential long-term care workers are less likely than workers in general to be covered by employer-provided retirement and health insurance benefits.

"For too long, our society has devalued the elderly and people with disabilities as well as the workers who help them lead more enriched and independent lives. It is no coincidence that women—particularly women of color and immigrants—perform much of this hands-on care work, both paid and unpaid, in homes and in residential long-term care settings," said Julia Wolfe, former EPI state economic analyst and co-author of the report.

Prior to the pandemic, employment in the residential long-term care industry was increasing rapidly but failing to meet demand. During the pandemic, this industry experienced sharp job losses and employment is still nearly 400,000 below pre-pandemic levels, which accounts for about one-third (34.8%) of the private-sector jobs lost over that period. In almost every state, residential long-term care employment has not recovered to pre-pandemic levels, according to the report.

The report calls for expanding public funding to ensure higher pay and improved working conditions for care workers, which will also attract and retain an experienced and committed workforce. In addition, policymakers can pass legislation to raise the minimum wage and strengthen protections for workers seeking to organize a union. States and localities can establish industry-specific worker standards boards to recommend changes to industry minimum wages and working conditions.

"Employment levels in the long-term care industry have failed to meet demand, and the shortfall is expected to grow.

Caltrans: Sweeping your Tax Dollars Away

By ERIC CAINE, The Valley Citizen

We're still waiting for a report from Caltrans on how much it costs to sweep the average homeless camp along one of California's freeways. We do know that last November, Caltrans estimated it would spend $36 million on homeless camp cleanups this year alone.

Caltrans workers assigned to the sweeps, highway patrol officers who provide security during the sweeps, and neighboring businesses and residents all know that when homeless people are forced out of one place, they just move to another, often only a block or two away.

In those cases when there's no nearby open ground, they infiltrate city parks, downtown, vacant lots, canal margins, riverbanks, and any other spot where there's room for a shopping cart and human body. They stay at the new site until forced to move by city cops, county sheriffs, local business owners, or homeowners. Then the whole process starts again.

It's not Caltrans' fault it's spending millions of tax dollars only so that millions more can be spent on futile attempts to sweep homelessness under the rug. Caltrans' negative capability is just one more sign of government's failure when responding to human distress with exercises in cruelty.

The sweep isn't the only example of extravagant government waste in failing to reduce the harms of homelessness, but it may be the easiest to understand. Most everyone living in a west coast city of any size has seen the failures repeated many times over.

Imagine a wealthy state (the current California budget surplus is around $49 billion) where over 160,000 people lack consistent access to toilets, running water, and a place to keep their belongings. Further imagine many of these same people trying to form small communities for mutual aid and protection only to be forced again and again to disband and move along.

This is the natural state of homeless people in California today, where those 160,000 people live in a state of daily crisis, often even when in a traditional shelter, where their basic physical needs, and in many cases their illnesses — whether mental or physical — are disregarded or even disparaged as failures of character.

People who enter shelters today are not the same as in the past. According to Modesto's Salvation Army Shelter Director, approximately 40% of the residents in Stanislaus County's low barrier shelter are mentally ill; there is little to no likelihood they will become self-sufficient and there is no other place to put them than the shelter.

Another group is elderly, and/or physically or mentally disabled; they will not become self-sufficient, and even if they did, there isn't enough housing to hold them.

Caltrans Sweep, Modesto, July 2022

While many of the state's leaders have finally realized housing shortages are a major factor in rising homeless numbers, far too few understand that so-called "affordable housing" is not the answer to chronic homelessness.

In Modesto, city leaders boasted about approving a project that would provide 14 units of permanent housing for at-risk youth at a cost of $3.8 million, or $271,000 an apartment. In nearby Riverbank, a "tiny house" project has been advertised at a cost of $350,000 per unit. Costly units like these take too long and accomplish too little; homelessness is a crisis of humanity that needs to be addressed with emergency measures now.

Though there have been attempts to blame homelessness on the homeless, there's more than enough factual information to discredit such theories. In May of this year, the Stanford Institute for Economic Research released "Homelessness in California: Causes and Policy Considerations."

The Stanford study emphasizes "high housing costs, inadequate shelter spaces, deinstitutionalization, and changes in the criminal justice system" as major factors in homelessness. Among other things, it recommends, "more shelter capacity and increased investment in cost-effective housing."

The quickest and most effective way to increase shelter capacity is to implement safe ground policies for permitted camping. Modesto and Stanislaus County did this in 2018 when they opened Beard Brook Park for camping. When campers in the park were relocated to a site near Modesto's 9th Street Bridge, the on-site population burgeoned to almost 500. Costs in maintaining the camp were estimated at $13 per person per day.

Most people think of congregate shelters when they hear the words "shelter capacity," but permitted camping showed shelter can be provided far more quickly and inexpensively than traditional shelter options. Moreover, the majority of homeless people who have lived in congregate shelters don't want to stay for numerous reasons, but especially because there is so little privacy and the chances of moving on are so slight.

Shelter options in addition to permitted camping are also available. When compared to the costs of sweeps, congregate shelters, lost property values, environmental damage and adverse effects on human health, alternative shelter options provide by far the best method for getting people off the streets, out of the dirt, and into humane and cost-effective living conditions.

One such option, Pallet Shelters, cost $6,995 each and can be set up in a day. Fifty such units could be put into service almost immediately for the approximate cost of one of Riverbank's $350,000 "affordable" housing units.

Important as they are, costs are not the most significant factor in our failure to mitigate the multiple harms of homelessness. The crucial factor — the element we continue to ignore at our own peril — is our failure to realize that homelessness is a humanitarian crisis during which we continue to treat people in distress with cruel disregard and callous indifference. That stain on our own humanity won't soon be swept away.

Homeless: The Accountability Papers #3

By ERIC CAINE, The Valley Citizen

“Given the significant dollars spent to address homelessness, this lack of accountability is problematic and can undermine the public’s confidence in our public agencies.”

Stanislaus County Civil Grand Jury, June 2022

It was only last year that Stanislaus County added “accountability” to its plan for reducing regional homelessness. The new measure was intended to hold homeless people more accountable for being homeless.

Released this June, in yet another of too many ironies to count regarding government failures on homelessness, the Stanislaus County Civil Grand Jury Report of 2021-2022 found that “accountability is lacking,” not among the homeless, but as a result of the myriad government agencies, non-profits, churches, charities and private organizations focused on ending homelessness in Stanislaus County.

The Grand Jury’s conclusion that attempts to reduce homelessness have failed wasn’t news to anyone still relying on the evidence of their senses. Burgeoning homeless numbers are visible everywhere in the form of bodies on the sidewalks, along freeway margins, and prone in local parks.

However, while no one with eyes and ears needs to know that homeless numbers have continued to grow, the great value of the Stanislaus County Civil Grand Jury Report (SCCGJ) is in its finding that there are,

.... dozens of public agencies, private organizations, and non-profits working in this arena. It is hard to evaluate coordination, effectiveness, and accountability when efforts are so fragmented. The SCCGJ found that while efforts to coordinate all these agencies and their activities are being pursued, accountability is lacking. Given the significant dollars spent to address homelessness, this lack of accountability is problematic and can undermine the public’s confidence in our public agencies.

Anyone working on the ground with homeless people in need of help would add that not only is there a “lack of accountability,” there is also a lack of candor about why homeless numbers continue to grow.

Consider, for example, just one segment of the homeless population, the mentally ill. Salvation Army Major Harold Laubach recently estimated that forty percent of the residents of Stanislaus County’s Low Barrier Shelter are mentally ill. He added that another forty percent deal with “substance abuse problems.”

Laubach noted that given the absence of alternatives, homeless shelters were a better option than homelessness itself. The vast majority of homeless people, ill or not, disagree. The evidence is in the ongoing availability of beds in local shelters.

Though they were never designed for such purposes, today’s shelters now serve dual roles as mental institutions and warehouses for drug users in search of help. Staff at the shelters lack training to deal with such problems while shortages of infrastructure and services prevent timely transition to more appropriate venues. No wonder so many people avoid traditional shelters.

The plain fact is that our homeless crisis is actually a housing and care crisis, and not necessarily even an “affordable housing” crisis, insofar as no housing is affordable for people without incomes or the ability to earn them. And even though a great many homeless people do have incomes — often as a result of disabilities or retirement — those incomes are far too little to afford traditional housing options.

Those who might benefit from traditional housing options include workers in fast food, Amazon warehouses, and other jobs that pay too little to meet today’s housing costs. However, those traditional housing options — apartments and studios — would have to be constructed so that rents would be far lower than today’s averages. Given mounting costs of construction and building fees, it’s improbable we’ll have such options any time soon. Meanwhile, people with insufficient incomes for traditional housing options are living in their cars.

These hard facts about homelessness would ordinarily mean we have a humanitarian crisis brought about by insufficient housing and services to accommodate peoples’ needs for health care, shelter, including toilets and running water, and community services such as trash and garbage disposal. Instead, we have “homelessness” and debates about its causes, almost none of which acknowledge the central problem is fellow citizens in dire need of urgent care.

The SCCGJ did not note that political leaders benefit from lack of accountability and won’t be eager to accept responsibility of any kind. They much prefer the fog of a fragmented, inefficient, and dysfunctional system to having to answer for their failures. Positive change won’t happen as long as the same players continue to dominate access to revenue streams while squandering resources and avoiding meaningful action in favor of cruel indifference to human suffering.

Residential long-term care workers

Yet long-term care workers do not receive adequate pay for their work, and many live in poverty,” said Sebastian Martinez Hickey, EPI research assistant and co-author of the report. “If we are to ensure that those who need care receive quality care, we must be able to attract more workers to this profession and ensure that those workers have the pay, benefits, and supports they need.”

“The deficiencies in access, quality of care, and quality of life for residents and their families are inseparable from the struggles and deficiencies in job quality, societal recognition, public funding, and voice on the job for long-term care workers,” said Maroke Sawo, EPI state economic analyst and co-author of the report. “Only when workers, care recipients, and their families stand together in solidarity can the U.S. overcome its short-sightedness to secure the services and job quality necessary for a dignified collective future. Such a future can be achieved only with adequate public funding that simultaneously improves conditions for care workers and ensures adequate care access and quality for those in need, regardless of their income or wealth level.”

EPI is an independent, nonprofit think tank that researches the impact of economic trends and policies on working people in the United States. EPI’s research helps policymakers, opinion leaders, advocates, journalists, and the public understand the bread-and-butter issues affecting ordinary Americans.

Autumn Art Festival Exhibition open at Mistlin Gallery

When: August 16 to October 15, 11:30am – 5:00pm.

Where: Mistlin Gallery, 1015 J St, Modesto, CA

Gala Fundraiser: September 10, 6 - 9 p.m.

The Autumn Art Festival is the annual juried member show featuring the best works of our Central California Art Association community. Over $2,000 in prizes have been awarded in five categories of media. The Best of Show award went to a digitally created painting by Rebecca Jo (shown below), titled Metamorphosis. All works are for sale.

The awards will be presented at an annual fundraising gala, held on September 10. The gala includes fine food and wine, jazz music by Roger Coss, and of course all the extraordinary art by our member artists. Tickets are available at ccaagallery.org/shop for $35.

A fundraising auction is also taking place, online until the Sept. 10 gala, then finishing live at the evening event. To view, bid or purchase items, visit 32auctions.com/ccaagala22 or use the QR code. Items range from art donated by our members to collectibles and workshops. An original painting by the late Dan Petersen is part of the auction.

All proceeds from this event help to provide community outreach, exhibitions and continuing programs provided by CCAA, a local non-profit 501c3. Donations are welcome, and tax deductible.

To The Man in Modesto with the Flag in His Truck

(Yes, I'm talking to You)

On July 4, I watched you mount the flag into the bed of your truck. My heart fell to my feet, not wanting to acknowledge your gloating. But I witnessed your delight...it was a happy task for you. I wanted to deny your hip-hip-hooray for the corrupted judges on the bench. (July 4th was just days away from the Roe reversal, a cataclysm for women).

I say to you man of Modesto -- it is a corrupted bonanza you glory in. Womankind are paying dearly for your celebration--equality, freedom, gone. But go ahead, honk enthusiastically over the reversal of feminist advances. As you drive by, rev your engine in support of diminished checks and balances. You should realize, though, that your own predilections are exhibited for all to see.

I say secure that pole, then lay some rubber! So many see you. I'm here to remind you that the wind that moves your flag also moves Me. Blown away are my illusions, misplaced hero worship, admiration, the Man Myth. A center within me remains, absent reverence, filled to the brim with Knowing Who You Are. Look out from your high seat there in the cab; as I must see You, so must you see Me.

I feel the waves of your smugness flying free out the window; they weigh me down. While you celebrate a shocking vulgarity, I'm digging the grave of my trust in you. Think twice, for those who bear life for you are also those who make your life bearable. I've been in this fight, gained ground, lost ground; so, too will my granddaughters enter the fray. I see a future for them where our nation becomes what it was meant to be, a true democracy.

Where equality blesses all and diversity is the highest celebration,
Where checks and balances are honored, and greed is trampled underfoot.
Where women are not attacked for daring to hold their own power, Where daughters never know the twisted metal hook of a clothes hanger.

– The Woman Who Sees You

Lines Written in Early Spring

I heard a thousand blended notes,
While in a grove I sate reclined,
In that sweet mood when pleasant thoughts
Bring sad thoughts to the mind.

To her fair works did nature link
The human soul that through me ran;
And much it grieved my heart to think
What man has made of man.

Through primrose tufts, in that sweet bower,
The periwinkle trailed its wreaths;
And 'tis my faith that every flower
Enjoys the air it breathes.

The birds around me hopped and played:
Their thoughts I cannot measure,
But the least motion which they made,
It seemed a thrill of pleasure.

The budding twigs spread out their fan,
To catch the breezy air;
And I must think, do all I can,
That there was pleasure there.

If this belief from heaven be sent,
If such be Nature's holy plan,
Have I not reason to lament
What man has made of man?

Award-Winning Poet Kai Coggin to Facilitate MoSt Workshop on October 1

The Modesto-Stanislus Poetry Center (MoSt) is very pleased to announce that award-winning poet Kai Coggin will facilitate a special Zoom Workshop Event on Saturday, October 1, 2022.

Kai Coggin (she/her) is the author of four poetry collections, most recently Mining for Stardust (FlowerSong Press 2021) and INCANDESCENT (Sibling Rivalry Press 2019). She is a queer woman of color who thinks Black Lives Matter, a teaching artist in poetry with the Arkansas Arts Council and Arkansas Learning Through the Arts, and host of the longest-running, consecutive weekly open mic series in the country — “Wednesday Night Poetry.”

Recently awarded the 2021 Governor’s Arts Award, named “Best Poet in Arkansas” by the Arkansas Times, and nominated as Hot Springs Woman of the Year, her fierce and powerful poetry has been nominated four times for The Pushcart Prize, as well as Bettering American Poetry 2015, and Best of the Net 2016, 2018, 2021 — awarded in 2022. Her poems have appeared or are forthcoming in POETRY, Best of the Net, Cultural Weekly, SOLSTICE, Bellevue Literary Review, TAB, Entropy, SWWIM, Split This Rock, Sinister Wisdom, Lavender Review, Tupelo Press, West Trestle Review, and elsewhere. Coggin is Associate Editor at The Rise Up Review and on the Board of Directors of the International Women’s Writing Guild.

She lives with her wife and their two adorable dogs in the valley of a small mountain in Hot Springs National Park, Arkansas.

The Zoom event is scheduled to run from 10 am until 12:30 pm. A registration form will be available on the MoSt website (www.mostpoetry.org). Registration is $20.00.

A Poem You Write, Dear Reader

Take this space for yourself. Grab a pen. Mine the stardust that remains etched in your cells after what we all experienced together. Write. Reflect. Put your feelings down onto the page. How did you break? How did you grow? What do you take with you into tomorrow?

Essence

I thinned the seeds already sprouting in the bamboo garden
the radish beet carrot and bean pulled each birth out of the earth and laid it on my tongue crushed it with my teeth and did you know these tiny sprouts these little leaves and baby greens already hold the heavy flavors of their final selves?

if only we tasted our own essence from birth knew the transformations to come were all part of the becoming — that we had the imprint all along.

Ring Sing

There is a new song
that comes from my fingers, a new vibration as the sound of my promise clinks against the everyday things
I hold and touch,

the sound my wedding ring makes against a glass,
a tiny bell of hope,

the song it makes as I swipe the sudsy stainless steel sink, push wet carrot tops and bean ends
into the garbage disposal with this soft scrape of gentle forever,

I keep hearing
what I think are bells, but it is just my ring singing into everything.

Palette

last night before sleep she drew pictures on my back with her fingers
a test of my spatial recognition my ability to form a horse a sun a sailboat from the movement of her fingertip traces against my skin to see it take shape in my mind’s eye invisible palette

the curvature of my back competing with her delicate design of flower fish smile and I cannot guess cannot translate the trace to shape each time she erases whole palm swipes in the dark tries again rabbit snail
and I am the worst at this game because just being touched by the fingertip of this artist just having my skin rise to meet her all I can picture in these traces is

For bird lovers like members of Stanislaus Audubon Society, the thrill of seeing native species like Swainson's Hawk, Lazuli Bunting and Blue Grosbeak thrive in their natural habitat is exceeded only by their gratitude for the work of the Central Valley Joint Venture, including River Partners. Absent their dedication to restoring the loss of 95% or our riparian forests and 90% of our native wetlands, recovery of wounded nature would almost certainly be doomed.

Instead, the ongoing restoration of the San Joaquin Valley's rivers, floodplains, and spectacular wildlife provides multiple reasons to be optimistic about humankind's role as nature's guardian and steward.

AREA 5150 UFO RADIO – Saturday night at Midnight.

LOCALLY PRODUCED PROGRAMS

I-On-Modesto - John Griffin interviews local people who reveal their inspiring stories. Mondays & Fridays, 10 am and Wednesdays at 9 pm.

Valley Air District Offers Clean Air Funding for Sustainable Agriculture

Clean air funding currently available, with increased funding for small growers

From the San Joaquin Valley Air Pollution Control District.

In the San Joaquin Valley, strong collaboration between agricultural operations, the San Joaquin Valley Air Pollution Control District (Valley Air District), California Air Resources Board (CARB), USDA Natural Resources Conservation Service (USDA-NRCS), and U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is providing significant reductions in air pollution, toxic air contaminants, and greenhouse gases through public and private partnership to deploy the latest and cleanest technologies. These incentive-based efforts have significantly reduced air pollution from various agricultural operations through applicant cost-shared grant programs, with enhanced incentive funding for smaller farming operations facing the greatest difficulties in transitioning to new equipment. Through these efforts, over 16,000 old high-polluting agricultural pieces of equipment have been replaced, and the open burning of over 109,000 acres (nearly 3,000,000 tons of woody waste) has been eliminated through non-burning alternative practices including chipping and soil incorporation.

Funding sources in support of these clean air efforts include local Valley Air District funding, California Climate Investments and other state funding, and federal Diesel Emission Reduction Act and Targeted Airshed Grant funding. As key examples of currently available funding, the District recently accepted $168.4 million from the State of California under the Funding Agricultural Replacement Measures for Emission Reductions (FARMER) program, and $180 million for the Alternatives to Agricultural Open Burning program.

“The District appreciates the Governor, State Legislature, and Federal government recognizing the public health benefits that result from these clean air investments,” stated Samir Sheikh, Executive Director/Air Pollution Control Officer for the Valley Air District.

“The San Joaquin Valley agricultural sector feeds our nation and the world, and sustainable agricultural strategies put into place by the Valley Air District’s Governing Board allow our Valley growers to produce the best quality produce and crops using the cleanest practices and equipment,” stated Stanislaus County Supervisor Vito Chiesa, Chair of the Valley Air District’s Governing Board.

These District incentive programs provide funding to farmers, matched with applicant funding, to voluntarily replace their old, higher-polluting equipment with new, much cleaner equipment. To ensure equitable access to these resources, small growers are offered additional incentives, including:

Agricultural Tractor Replacement Program:

- Operations of 100 acres or less can now receive up to 80% off the cost of eligible new latest certified equipment
- Operations of 100 acres or less can now receive up to 80% off the cost of eligible certified pre-owned Tier 3 equipment
- Operations between 101 and 500 acres can now receive up to 70% off the cost of eligible new latest certified equipment.
- Alternatives to Open Burning Incentive Program
- Operations of 100 acres or less can now receive an additional $100 per acre (in addition to $300 to $1,300 per acre based on crop type and practice) to deploy clean alternatives to open burning

Officials from the Valley Air District, CARB, USDA-NRCS, U.S. EPA and California Legislature gathered with Valley farmers and leaders this morning to crush several old high-polluting tractors and pieces of equipment that were being eliminated through the program. On hand for the crushing of her old tractor was small farmer and Vice President of the African American Farmers of California, Shirley Rowe. "I just received my new tractor! It's a New Holland, it's beautiful and they are going to teach me how to drive it and I am real glad to get rid of my old International and get into this cleaner tractor," she stated. "I'm very grateful to the Valley Air District and I am hopeful that small farmers can continue to use these various programs."

In addition to these programs, the District offers a variety of programs to support Valley farmers, residents, businesses, and public agencies with cleaner equipment, vehicles, and practices. Visit www.valleyair.org/grants or call the grants team at 559-230-5800 for more information.

Clean air investments in the Valley have significantly reduced air pollution, resulting in substantial air quality improvements throughout the Valley. Despite these improvements and ongoing local clean air efforts, more state and federal investment is needed to continue addressing mobile source emissions under state and federal jurisdiction (heavy duty vehicles and equipment) that make up the majority of air pollution in the San Joaquin Valley.

The Valley Air District covers eight counties including San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Merced, Madera, Fresno, Kings, Tulare and San Joaquin Valley air basin portions of Kern. For additional information about the San Joaquin Valley Air Pollution Control District, visit www.valleyair.org or call 559-230-6000.

JOB OPENING: Executive Director: Work with Musicians and Help Youth at the Same Time!

By BRENDA FRANCIS, former Executive Director, Modesto Sound

Modesto Sound is a recording studio open to all ages. We offer live sound services while providing job training to youth. Modesto Sound has recorded over 500 artists, held hundreds of concerts, and recorded thousands of public service announcements for radio.

We are passionate about what we do and know that healthy programs for youth are of utmost importance. Hundreds of young people have attended our programs and come back time and time again to help our mission continue with their vibrant energy and enthusiasm.

For this job, fresh college graduates will be considered as well as people with no degree but have business management experience.

Music skills and live sound concert experience are a plus. There are some accounting, program management, and organizing meetings involved too, of course. Pay is $18-$30 an hour depending on experience.

Open since 2005, our mission is to empower youth with real-world job skills to create music and artistic media. We are seeking an energetic Executive Director that this position speaks to. We also need someone to help with our live sound and, if they happen to be the same person, it would be more hours and more fun!

Either way, apply. We look forward to talking with you and hopefully meeting you!
