National Alliance on Mental Illness: Ending the Silence with Courage and Advocacy

An interview by TOM PORTWOOD

In an age of instant information, one would think that society’s ancient stigma against people who suffer from mental illness would have melted away by now – that with the wealth of knowledge on the subject available at our fingertips, we would have become more open and accepting in the way we respond to people who are experiencing mental health issues. Sadly, a deadening silence is often the response.

The nonprofit group, Mental Health America, estimated in 2015 that there were some 44 million adults who had mental health problems, so the silence has become a pandemic affecting millions of families. “A lot of people are going through mental illness, and sometimes they don’t know what they’re going through – they don’t recognize the symptoms. Or, when they do know what it is, they don’t feel comfortable in talking about it,” explains Rhonda Allen, a strong local advocate for the seriously mentally ill and their families, and a member of the Stanislaus County chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI). “Sometimes even doctors don’t recognize the symptoms of mental illness in their patients. People shouldn’t be afraid to reach out and ask questions. People aren’t afraid now to talk about cancer or heart disease, but there’s still a stigma about mental illness.”

This deep-seated fear of even speaking about mental illness can be very damaging for families and their loved ones who are experiencing some of the symptoms of mental illness. That’s especially why NAMI was founded. “NAMI’s been around since 1979, “Ms. Allen further explains. “It’s a grassroots organization started by family members who felt the need to give support to loved ones who had a mental illness. It’s nationwide - in all fifty states - and actually we have chapters in other countries as well. NAMI Stanislaus is comprised of a volunteer board which meets once a month. We organize classes and support groups. We have speakers who we train to go out into the community. That’s a big part of what we do.”

The NAMI Stanislaus support groups typically meet once a week, in a meeting room down the hall from the chapter’s small office. “The intent of the groups is for the participants to bond, so that they do have someone to talk to,” Ms. Allen relates. “Family members want to share what their loved one is going through, and they want to know what this or that situation means, and what they should do about it. A lot of times they want to talk about medications and what’s working or what hasn’t worked. All kinds of things come up in these groups. Having a loved one experiencing mental illness is an extremely stressful situation for everyone in the family.”

NAMI Stanislaus offers a variety of classes and programs for the residents of our communities:

- Support Groups for families and individuals impacted by mental health issues.
- Ending the Silence – A program to lessen stigma and raise awareness about mental illness among teenagers.
- Family-To-Family Classes – For family members, partners, or friends of a person who has mental illness; a 12-week commitment.
- Peer-to-Peer Classes – A ten-week class that can help people to deal with their mental illness and maintain their recovery.

Poverty Under the New Public Charge Rule

From the California Budget & Policy Center

By now, the consequences of the Trump Administration’s recently announced “public charge” rule are known: thousands more families working to build a better future for themselves and our state will instead live in poverty.

Understanding the depth of harm for California’s immigrants and potential economic loss are imperative as state leaders and advocates pursue legal action and work to protect the socioeconomic well-being of families today and for future generations. Read the Budget Center’s latest report by Sara Kimberlin and Adriana Ramos-Yamamoto that explains how the public charge rule may lead to:

- 165,000 more Californians pushed into poverty and 115,000 more pushed into deep poverty as they are likely to avoid receiving the CalFresh food assistance and housing subsidies they need.
- 461,000 people living in poverty after disenrolling from public supports out of fear and the well-established “chilling effect” of recent federal executive actions.
- California losing out on $1.67 billion in federal benefits that helps the state’s economy. Visit the California Budget & Policy Center at https://calbudgetcenter.org/
Holiday gift bags for Women’s Prison

By DAVID HETLAND

The Central California Women’s Facility in Chowchilla is the largest female prison in the United States with nearly 2800 inmates, including the only State of California death row.

The Inmate Family Council, an officially sanctioned group of volunteers who advocate on behalf of their loved ones, distributes gift bags to the more than 2700 inmates during the winter holiday season. This requires an ongoing, year-round effort on the part of many caring individuals and organizations throughout the local area to gather appropriate items.

Your help is needed by collecting travel/sample sizes of the following: soap, shampoo, conditioner, skin/body lotion, toothpaste and tissue. There’s also a need for adult size toothbrushes (individually wrapped), full size wood pencils with erasers, and unused greeting cards with envelopes.

Donated items may be brought to the Peace/Life Center Office, 720 13th St., Modesto (call ahead to make sure the Office is open). For more information, contact Shelly, shellys833@aol.com, (209-521-6304) or Dave (209-388-1608)

Sinking to another level

By DEBBIE MILLER

Are we sinking to another level of horrific treatment of people of color? Or is this more of the same?

The recent stories about what can only be described as human rights abuses at the southern border of the US are horrifying. I, as well as many others, am deeply disturbed by the reports of conditions that seem almost unbelievable.

I was reading some old material from my days as an organizer with the United Farm Workers. I came across the accounts of children as young as four and five working in the fields in the days before Cesar Chavez, Dolores Huerta, and others began the farmworkers union. I was reminded of the lack of toilets in the fields. Women were forced to look for a spot to relieve themselves out of the sight of crew bosses. Many women were sexually assaulted by these same bosses. Parents earned so little that their children went to bed hungry. The lucky families slept in dilapidated migrant shacks, often with no electricity or running water. The less lucky slept under trees in orchards and, some, even in caves. Often there was no drinking water provided to those picking crops in the hot and dusty fields, often miles from the nearest town.

These stories could be ripped out of today’s headlines. Some currently detained migrants are being denied water or told to drink out of toilets.

So, what can we do?

First, we need to understand what is happening by educating ourselves. What is the common theme here? It is a belief that people with brown or black skin are not really people? How else can one explain the treatment of farmworkers over many decades and of the migrants currently at the border? It’s racism, pure and simple, or impure and obscene. Systemic racism is at the core of our country’s history, from the genocide of Native peoples, to the enslavement of African peoples, to the internment of the Japanese, as well as the treatment of brown, Black, and Filipino farmworkers, to the present-day detention of migrants in cages and concentration camps.

Second, we need to take action in whatever way is fitting and possible for us. People across the United States, Canada, and in several European countries, boycotted grapes for years in the 1960s and 1970s to support union organizing of farmworkers. Churches, unions, students, consumers, celebrities, and sympathetic politicians (think Robert F. Kennedy) of all races and economic levels joined together. They signed petitions, wrote letters, made phone calls, donated time and money, rallied, marched, boycotted, and voted. Their non-violent economic and political action improved the working conditions of farmworkers.

United action worked then. It can work now.

Be informed!

2020 Peace Essay Contest
Heroes of Peace

“It isn’t enough to talk about peace. One must believe in it.
And it isn’t enough to believe in it. One must work at it.”
Eleanor Roosevelt

Peace is understood to mean not only an absence of hostilities or war, but also a state of harmony and justice existing between people, groups or nations. All over the globe and throughout history, there have been people who have steadily worked for peace and justice through non-violent and non-military means. They have worked alone and sometimes joined with others, often working behind the scenes. These people are the rarely recognized heroes of peace.

Martin Luther King, Jr., Gandhi or Mother Teresa are examples of well known peacemakers. However, there are many people whose peacemaking efforts are not widely recognized. The experiences of these unheralded peacemakers are sometimes told in songs and stories, but seldom make the history books.

The 2020 Peace Essay Contest challenges you to find and bring recognition to one of these lesser-known heroes of peace. You may find them in your family or neighborhood, in your community or nation, or in places all over the globe. They may have lived in the past or might be living today. They may have used ideas, words, pens, music, shovels, diplomacy, technology or a variety of other common or unusual tools to build peace between people, groups or nations. The focus of each person’s work may differ, but common to all peacemakers is a commitment to using non-violent principles and actions to nurture and encourage positive relationships among people resulting in a more peaceful world, locally and beyond.

Division I (grades 11-12) and Division II (grades 9 - 10) 500-1000 Words
Division III (grades 7-8) and Division IV (grades 5-6) 250-500 Words

By talking with others and/or researching, find and write, in your own words, about a lesser known person who has worked for peace and justice through non-violent and non-military means. This person may have lived in the past or is living today. He or she may be from your local community or from anywhere around the globe, working to make our world a more fair and peaceful place.

In your essay:
• Describe who the person is/was and how he/she has worked for peace and justice.
• Explain why this person’s actions are an important contribution to building a more peaceful and just world.
• Tell how the work of this person might inspire you to also find ways to work for a more peaceful and just world.

Print your word count at the end of the text of your essay. Then show Works Cited for any quotations, borrowed ideas and facts that are not general knowledge. (The title and citations are not included in the word count.) If you are uncertain about plagiarism, ask your teacher. Further suggestions on using citations are included in the submission details and at http://peaceessaycontest.weebly.com/. See complete rules on backside of this flyer.

How to determine if a news source is reputable

From the UC Merced Library

Professor Melissa Zimrars “False, Misleading, Clickbait-y, and/or Satirical ‘News’ Sources” resource; some examples are added to Zimrars’ resource.

Avoid websites that end in “.lo” ex: Newslo. These sites take pieces of accurate information and then packaging that information with other false or misleading “facts” (sometimes for the purposes of satire or comedy). Example: Newslo also using URL politicot.com (similar to a legitimate news site)

Watch out for websites that end in “.com.co” as they are often fake versions of real news sources. Example: abcnews.com.co.

Watch out if known/reputable news sites are not also reporting on the story. Sometimes lack of coverage is the result of corporate media bias and other factors, but there should typically be more than one source reporting on a topic or event.

Odd domain names generally equal odd and rarely truthful news.

Lack of author attribution may, but not always, signify that the news story is suspect and requires verification.

Some news organizations are also letting bloggers post under the banner of particular news brands; however, many of these posts do not go through the same editing process (ex: BuzzFeed Community Posts, Kinja blogs, Forbes blogs).

Check the “About Us” tab on websites or look up the website on Snopes or Wikipedia for more information about the source.

Bad web design and use of ALL CAPS can also be a sign that the source you’re looking at should be verified and/or read in conjunction with other sources. Example: Drudge Report

If the story makes you REALLY ANGRY it’s probably a good idea to keep reading about the topic via other sources to make sure the story you read wasn’t purposefully trying to make you angry (with potentially misleading or false information) in order to generate shares and ad revenue.

If the website you’re reading encourages you to DOX individuals, it’s unlikely to be a legitimate source of news. DOX refers to publishing an individual’s personal information with the intent of causing harm.

It’s always best to read multiple sources of information to get a variety of viewpoints and media frames. Some sources not yet included in this list (although their practices at times may qualify them for addition), such as The Daily Kos, The Huffington Post, and Fox News, vacillate between providing important, legitimate, problematic, and/or hyperbolic news coverage, requiring readers and viewers to verify and contextualize information with other sources.

A New Tyranny of the Minority Threatens Wildlife and Nature

WILDLIFE ENDANGERED

By ERIC CAIN, The Valley Citizen

But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee: Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee: and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind. Job: 12:7

It’s only in the last few years that Bald Eagles have returned from a long absence to nest in the foothills and around the lakes and reservoirs of the northern San Joaquin Valley. Increasingly common, sightings of our majestic national symbol still fill people with admiration and awe; it’s easy to forget how close the eagles came to extinction — the once widespread raptors almost disappeared from the lower forty-eight states only a few decades ago.

Bald Eagles were placed on the endangered species list in 1973, at the same time as the passage of the Endangered Species Act. Their decline was traced to reproductive failure caused by a residue from DDT. Once DDT was banned, the eagles began a long period of recovery.

In part because of successful efforts with popular birds like the Bald Eagle, and despite a decades-long, multi-million-dollar effort to repeal it, the Endangered Species Act (ESA) has remained one of the most popular government programs ever established. When it was passed, bipartisan support for the ESA was overwhelming; the vote in Congress was 482-12 in favor of saving our nation’s threatened wildlife heritage.

More recently, conservation reports reveal public support for the ESA has remained as high as 80% throughout the almost fifty years of its existence. In addition to the Bald Eagle, the ESA has protected over 2300 species, subspecies and distinct populations since enactment.

One of the most successful recoveries has been in Stanislaus County, where the formerly endangered Aleutian Canada Goose recovered from a low of under six-hundred individuals in the 1980s to a population now estimated at almost 200,000.

A close relative of the diminutive Cackling Goose, and most easily distinguished by the white collar at the base of its neck, Aleutian Geese were threatened both by predatory Arctic Foxes on their northern nesting grounds in the Aleutian Islands and proposed development on their wintering grounds.

The foxes were introduced to the Aleutian Islands by Russian fur traders. Aleutian Goose wintering grounds in the 1980s were almost solely limited to farm and ranchlands between the confluences of the Tuolume, San Joaquin and Stanislaus Rivers in western Stanislaus County.

Though the wintering grounds were ultimately saved by a remarkable effort involving the National Audubon Society, private landowners, and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the major factor in their protection was the Endangered Species Act; it provided legal justification for protecting the birds’ habitat. With their wintering grounds safe, the geese began a steady recovery when the last of the Arctic Foxes were removed from their nesting grounds.

Today, the spectacular overflights of wintering Aleutian Geese have been joined by a multitude of other species, including Snow and Ross’s Geese, Canada Geese, and White-fronted Geese, as well as numerous species of ducks. The waterfowl are attracted to the San Joaquin River National Wildlife Refuge, which was established to provide habitat for the endangered Geese and associated wildlife.

In addition to protection afforded by the Endangered Species Act, Bald Eagles and Aleutian Geese until recently were protected by the Migratory Bird Treaty Act. Now, both the Migratory Bird Treaty Act (MBTA) and Endangered Species Act have been undermined by revisions ordered by the Trump administration. Essentially a gutting of both acts, the revisions mark a tragic come-down for a party once proud to claim the legacy of Republican Theodore Roosevelt.

Roosevelt helped establish 230 million acres of public lands during his presidency, including 150 million acres of national forest. Under Trump, the nation’s public heritage is under an unprecedented assault, as more and more public lands have been opened up for exploitation by private enterprise, especially the fossil fuel industry.

But the new Republican Party isn’t just assaulting America’s public heritage, it’s also attacking science and democratic principles. Government science reports on topics ranging from climate change to adverse effects of drilling for oil in the Arctic have been suppressed, censored, redacted and revised under Trump. Even a ban on chlorpyrifos, a pesticide shown conclusively to retard brain development in young children, was lifted by the EPA after pressure from the chemicals industry.

Revisions to the Migratory Bird Treaty Act and Endangered Species Act aren’t just about wildlife. They’re also about lifting restrictions on the wholesale destruction of public lands. They’re about drilling and fracking and poisoning the environment.

Few places in the United States are as vulnerable to destructive exploitation as California’s San Joaquin Valley. The U.S. Geological Survey has written that the Valley contains, “one of the single largest alterations of the land surface attributed to humankind.” Over 5,200 square miles of irrigation land have subsided at least a foot since the introduction of irrigated farming; some places have subsided well over twenty feet.

Over 95% of the Valley’s native wetlands and riparian forests, the kinds of places that harbor wintering ducks, geese, and swans, have already been lost to urban and agricultural development. Imagine what could happen to the remainder without the protection of the ESA and MBTA.

Fortunately, California state authorities are pushing back against the assault on wildlife. In addition to joining other states in litigation against changes to federal protection for migratory birds and endangered species, California legislators have established new state guidelines that preserve the spirit and purpose of the MBTA.

But even with resistance from the state, the Valley continues to face threats of environmental degradation posed by the Trump administration. Last fall, federal officials began attempts to open 1.6 million California acres for drilling and fracking, with much of that acreage located in the southern San Joaquin Valley.

Fracking can contaminate groundwater and increase the probability of earthquakes, while continued use of fossil fuels threatens to accelerate climate change, already coming on almost too fast to reverse.

None of this matters to the new Party of Trump, but when the history of the Trump era is written, it will note that among the most singular achievements of a president who lost the popular vote has been his ability enact and enforce policies the vast majority of U.S. citizens oppose. In attacking the nation’s natural resources and native wildlife, the Trump administration has established a new tyranny of the minority — not just a threat to nature itself, but to majority rule, a fundamental tenet of democratic societies everywhere.

“Every time we turn our heads the other way when we see the law flouted, when we tolerate what we know to be wrong, when we close our eyes and ears to the corrupt because we are too busy or too frightened, when we fail to speak up and speak out, we strike a blow against freedom and decency and justice.” Robert F. Kennedy

Meet the Parkland father keeping his son’s message alive through art

By Loretta Graceffo

Joaquin Oliver loved basketball, the music of Frank Ocean and his family. On February 14, 2018, only a few months before he was supposed to graduate high school, he was shot down with an AR-15 in the Marjory Stoneman Douglas massacre. He was 17 years old.

The massacre became a turning point for the gun control movement, sparking conversations on bump stocks, background checks, and eliminating NRA money from politics. It also ignited nationwide school walkouts and the March for Our Lives, which became the largest youth-led demonstration in U.S. history, drawing nearly 1.2 million people from across the country.

Before the shooting, Joaquin’s father, Manuel Oliver, was an artist who had immigrated from Venezuela to pursue a safer life for his family. Today, Manuel is dedicated to exposing NRA corruption, empowering young activists and honoring Joaquin, who he says was not only his son but his best friend.

Since Joaquin’s death, Manuel has traveled across America with his organization, Change the Ref, to continue the conversation on gun violence through urban art. The organization, founded by him and his wife Patricia, takes its name from a conversation Manuel had with his son shortly before his death. After a referee made an unfair call during a basketball game, Joaquin told Manuel, who coached his team, that they would not be able to win unless they “changed the ref.”

To date, Manuel has created 30 murals — what he calls “graphic activism” — in cities devastated by gun violence, from Chicago to El Paso. He’s celebrated what should have been Joaquin’s 18th birthday by leading protesters in singing “Happy Birthday” outside the NRA headquarters. He’s also made headlines for putting a bulletproof vest on Wall Street’s famous “Fearless Girl” statue, and for 3D-printing sculptures of children cowering under desks, hiding from a school shooter. More recently, he’s produced a one-man show called “Guac: My Son, My Hero” that tells the story — equal parts joyful and devastating — of your family and your son’s life.

“Del otro lado, también matan a nuestros hijos,” [which means, “On the other side, they also murder our kids.”]

Manuel Oliver with his mural on the U.S.-Mexico border. (Twitter/Manuel Ayala)

I was trying to put together two things that really affect me. One is gun violence, because I lost my son. And the other one is the way people treat immigrants like me and my son and my wife. Those two things motivated me to do whatever it takes to make a statement.

I remember the border patrol on the American side wondering what I was doing, because they cannot access the other side. Now, when I go out of the country and then back, they ask me a lot of questions. I had a nice conversation with an immigration officer who said, “You understand that I have to ask you questions, because you were actually painting on a property of the United States government, and this is my job.”

I told him, “Well, you have to understand that this is my job. I’m trying to save your kid. Because it’s too late for me to save my kid.” And that always ends in a handshake, or a “keep on doing what you’re doing.” I really find a lot of support. You’d be surprised where the support is coming from.

Your latest project is an interactive one-man show called “Guac: My Son, My Hero” that tells the story — equal parts joyful and devastating — of your family and your son’s life. How have you approached theater as a tool to advocate for social justice?

The murals, they involve public speaking. So I understand that you have to have an active presence with communities to let them know what’s going on. It’s a really powerful way of approaching the problem. Theater is just another tool to empower and make the message even more accessible to people. In a way, I’m entertaining people, and I’m fine with that, because while I’m entertaining you, I’m also letting you know what’s going on.

Making the show interactive wasn’t a decision, it was something I discovered through doing different events. It is a natural feeling, in all of us, to want to be a part of things. We want to be there in the first row, and we want to hang out.

The only thing I know how to do is art, which also happens to be a nontraditional way of hitting this, because I haven’t seen it before. I’ve seen it before from artists, but not from fathers of victims. So we have a way to impact people in a legit way. What we do is often more social than political. I really believe in social movements as a way to change our problem from the roots.

We did it with the tobacco industry. That, more than a political decision, was a community decision. A civil decision. We found it disgusting, and now you don’t see the tobacco lobby showing their power over politicians. I think that the NRA and the gun lobby are going towards the same destiny that the tobacco industry had. But the only way to do that is with the right message — very disruptive, very nontraditional, and sometimes uncomfortable for some people.

Because of your murals, there are thousands of people across America who feel like they know Joaquin. Why is it important to portray Joaquin’s personality through your art?

My first role here is to be Joaquin’s dad. This is not about people knowing about me, I don’t give a shit about people knowing me. I try to make sure people know all the elements that made my son such a great person. Joaquin was a natural born activist before the shooting. We had amazing conversations about civil rights and social issues and injustice. He was very concerned about gun violence. Really concerned. The sad part was that he was murdered. He became a target. We cannot have that powerful voice with us anymore, unless we do what we’re doing. I’m here to share his message, in the most rapid way, to everybody. We work together in this, me and Joaquin. This is more his statement than my art.

By knowing about Joaquin, you will understand that a nice, beautiful person was shot down in the most unfair way that you could ever imagine. Inside his school, walking as a student, making sure that he had a good education, being happy on Valentine’s Day, giving flowers to his girlfriend. He had a coffee that morning with his dad. So I can make sure people know all that.

One of your most powerful murals was painted on the US-Mexico border. What was your experience creating that mural, and why did you decide to make a mural there?

Everyone was talking about building a wall, so we went to Tijuana, Mexico. And we wrote on the border wall, next to Joaquin’s image, “Del otro lado, también matan a nuestros hijos,” [which means, “On the other side, they also murder our kids.”]

The organization you and your wife started, Change the Ref, is known for using unconventional methods to get your point across. How do you approach spreading your message, and why do you think it’s effective?

I try to do things that haven’t been tried yet. Our methods are nontraditional, because I’ve seen traditional methods failing. We’ve had a blue Senate, we’ve had a blue house in Congress, and we didn’t see those results. Relying on politi

Making the show interactive wasn’t a decision, it was something I discovered through doing different events. It is a natural feeling, in all of us, to want to be a part of things. We want to be there in the first row, and we want to hang out.
Querida Familia Latina

Over 200 actors, activists, civil rights and labor leaders, business people and other Latinx leaders have signed on to demonstrate our love for the Latinx community and our country. This letter was written and organized by America Ferrera, Diane Guerrero, Eva Longoria, Alex Martinez Kondracke, Mónica Ramírez and Olga Segura.

If you are feeling terrified, heartbroken and defeated by the barrage of attacks on our community, you are not alone. We have been smeared by political rhetoric and murdered in violent hate crimes.

We have been separated from our families and have watched our children caged.

We have been targeted with mass shootings and mass ICE raids meant to terrify us, squash our hope, and break our spirits.

But, we will not be broken. We will not be silenced. We will continue to denounce any hateful and inhumane treatment of our community. We will demand dignity and justice.

Though real pain and fear are sweeping through our communities, we remain powerful.

The indignities and cruelty we have endured will never change the truth that the contributions we make to this country are invaluable. Our humanity must be respected. And, we won’t stop organizing for ourselves, our children, and for the soul of this nation.

To our allies who feel our community’s pain, we need you. We cannot make change without your voices and action. We call on you to speak out loudly against hate, to contribute your resources to organizations that support our community, and to hold our leaders accountable.

We ask you to join us in building a better country where we are all safe and valued.

May we turn this time of despair into a time of action. May our love for one another be the guiding light in these dark times.

With our deepest love,
America Ferrera
Diane Guerrero
Eva Longoria, and over 200 signers.

On the Public Record is just too good

By ERIC CAINE, The Valley Citizen

Sometimes it’s easy to forget how little most of us really know about water in the San Joaquin Valley. And even when we do know just a little, it’s even easier for what little we know to be submerged in the flood of mis- and disinformation that fills most of our media most of the time.

For those reasons and more, insiders who follow western water news closely rely on Maven’s Notebook, a masterly aggregation of everything relevant to water compiled by Chris Austin, better known as The Maven.

And the real hard core water zealots, those for whom water news ranks above sports, politics, celebrity gossip and even gory crime, never fail to scan their mailboxes closely for a post from the mystery author who, too infrequently, posts in On the Public Record (OtPR).

Self-described as, “a low-level civil servant who reads reports,” the author responsible for OtPR quite wisely prefers to remain anonymous, or, in his or her own words, “pseudonymous, distinct from the other anonyice” (sic). He or she adds, and this is crucial: “I don’t want to meet the influential names in the field nor sit in important meetings. If I meet them, I would probably like them and lose my ability to call them terrible things. We all know how important that is to me.”

Calling powerful people, “terrible things,” is one of the most burdensome obligations of journalists everywhere, at least those for whom, “speaking truth to power,” is a firm directive. And given how much evasion, equivocation, misdirection and outright lying flows from the mouths of powerful people when they’re talking about water, it’s no wonder anyone pursuing the truth manages so frequently to be perched on the horns of a dilemma.

On the one hand, one wishes to be civil, fair, and objective. On the other, when, after observing, smelling, and consulting with experts in the field one is confronted with what is obviously a pile of horseshit that’s been described as rose petals steeped in Napoleon Cognac, how does one go about correcting the record without offense?

It’s a problem our local journalists too often address with the attractive but duplicitous “both sides” approach. The “both sides” directive demands one give as much credence to what one knows are lies and falsehoods as one does the truth. So if one is told that the stink of odoriferous equine waste is actually the sweet perfume of roses and fine liquor, the easy way out is to treat the story as, “he said, they said.”

But if the journalist happens to be our mystery, “low-level civil servant,” we get treated to the truth in the form of deeply learned commentary enriched by generous portions of wit and profanity. And this is someone who actually knows how and when to cuss.

The effect isn’t just educational and entertaining, it’s bracing. It’s like seeing clearly after a long bout of fuzzy vision and eye floaters.

And just when everyone thought s/he might have retired for good, our OtPR person resurfaced, probably because things go so false, foul and putrid, good conscience demanded a correction — and who better to provide it than someone who really, really knows water.

OtPR was revived a few months back, likely in response to the grim prospects of dealing with climate change without a plan. But OtPR really got up to speed more recently, about the time the Friant Water Authority began pushing what it calls the, “San Joaquin Valley Water Blueprint.”

The Blueprint appears to be yet another in a long line of attempts to deny the water deficit — some 3 to 5 million-acre feet — that has resulted from overdrafting groundwater in the San Joaquin Valley, especially from Merced south. The denial is necessary in order to delay as long as possible following the 500,000+ irrigated acres we must retire if we’re to even begin to achieve sustainable water use, especially given the effects of climate change and population growth.

There’s really no way to do justice to OtPR’s cutting review of the Blueprint, and there’s more below that. Especially don’t miss the August 8 post, which includes much-justified hilarity at the likelihood Westlands Water District will lose the money it put into attempts to promote Jerry Brown’s Twin Tunnels. It’s just too good.

Above the August 8 post, the August 15 post recounts Devin Nunes’ purchase of an estimated 100 square feet of farmland. It’s another “too good” post. The absentee congressman who turned out to be a fake farmer has generated much amusement on Twitter and elsewhere, but OtPR turns flogging Devin Nunes into performance art.

But don’t take my word for it. Go to On the Public Record, read it all the way down, and rejoice. It really is too good. Just too, too, good.

Poet Sheila D. Landre

Sheila D. Landre is a retired teacher, poet, minister, mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother who has been performing her work in public since 1995 at coffee houses, book stores, such as Sacramento’s Luna’s Art Café, the J-Street Café, Queen Bean, and on stage at the State Theatre, The Prospect Theatre Project in Modesto, Stockton’s Haggin Museum, and the Carnegie Center in Turlock.

Her work has appeared frequently in Penumbra (the literary magazine of California State University Stanislaus), iZam Bomba!, TalkArt, Song of the San Joaquin, Connections, and other northern California publications. She is a long-time member of the Licensed Fools writing group.

Inquisition

Christians of a certain era in vast portions of then-known land hunted down heretics who did not believe in Jesus Christ or who broke any of their own human rules. Infidels were tortured, killed if they did not change un-Catholic ways. That was centuries ago when Christianity was the law and kings and queens enforced it. The Inquisition’s over now. They don’t do that anymore.

In the still Dark Ages independent women with survival skills, healing powers, cats in their cottages, and possessions of their own were hunted down, accused of being vessels of a Devil their accusers had imagined into being. They burned the “witches” at the stake. But there were no witches. Innocents were murdered shamefully when murderers had the church’s law behind them. Let’s never do that again.

A Massachusetts village had quite a scare when young girls spread wild, hysterical tales of flying through windows, casting spells, causing death and illness, haunting dreams, dancing winter moonlight dances with that same old imagined Devil. Nineteen women hanged and one man was pressed to death before anyone spoke sanely at a time when the Bible drove the law. They called that a “witch hunt” too, but there were no witches. No one should have believed such nonsense.

These are modern times and this is a smart, young country with a Constitution. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. There is no state religion here and there never will be. The framers of that document learned from history and said, “We won’t do that again.” And yet—

Today some hold that their own beliefs, religious or otherwise, Christian or otherwise, should take precedent over those of others. No one should have a choice, they say. Compulsory birth of unwanted children required, no matter how or if the parents tried prevention, or who or what the father is, or what the circumstances of conception, rape or incest or fetal deformity, or degree of mortal danger to the mother.

They would change existing law so that all female bodies able to bear children would be forced to procreate by the beliefs of a few.

There would be inquisitions, witch hunts, incarceration, chaos in the courts, death to non-believers. There would be unwanted children, many born into poverty, abuse, or neglect. No guarantee of loving parents. No guarantee of help to grow and learn.

And abortion would continue as it always has. Laws would not prevent it. Personal beliefs would not curtail it.

Only knowledge of truth, justice, liberty, and birth control has any power at all.

Organ Donor

It’s right here on my license. I’m qualified to drive. I passed the tests, written and practical. I’m way past old enough. Born here. Live here. Vote here. My eyes and hair match the picture. I can parallel park like nobody’s business.

And I’m an organ donor. I signed the paper. It says so right here. When I’m done with my body parts, some desperate recipient can give it a go. Liver and kidneys are working quite well. Non-smoker. Lungs are good. Heart works predictably, always on time, but don’t even look for a gall bladder. That went years ago. They’re all the original parts, and I get to choose what, if anything, happens to them. It says so right here.

If a barely fertilized, possible somebody wants to gestate in my uterus, it would also need my permission. If it wants to endanger my health and my life, bend me all out of shape, take a chance on giving me a life-long job I can’t handle, stress I can’t take, time I don’t want to give, burdens you can’t even imagine a person could bear, I can say No, I choose not to use my body that way. Nobody gave me a test to see if I’m qualified. I can tell if I’m not. I choose to avoid all that drama, and you must do all you can to leave my uterus to me.

Had Trump not been elected...

By STEVEN FAULKNER

Had Trump not been elected:

- James Comey would be the FBI director and The Mueller Report would have never happened. I repeat....it would have NEVER EVEN HAPPENED.
- Brett Kavanaugh would have never even been a nominee.
- There would be transcripts of every meeting with Putin.
- There would be no family separations. Asylum seekers would still be given a hearing in court without being held for extended periods in for-profit detention centers while awaiting their court date; all of their families would have remained intact, and the estimated 1,500 kids indefinitely displaced from their parents would still be with their families.
- The Iran nuclear deal would still be in place thus eliminating the entire recent confrontation with Iran.
- The Saudi murder of Jamal Khashoggi would have been roundly condemned, and the billions in U.S. arms sales to Saudi Arabia that congress voted to condemn would certainly not be moving forward. The United States would still lead the way on human rights and support for emerging democracies around the world. Condemnation of ruthless authoritarians like Mohammad Bin Salman Al Saud, or Philippine President Rodrigo Duterte would still be a no brainer for an American head of state.
- DACA would still be the law of the land thus protecting those children brought to America without any choice or say in the matter.
- We would still be a leader when it comes to the Paris Climate Accord and the much-needed push to transition to renewable energy sources in the collectively necessary fight to stem the tide of climate change.
- Russia’s interference in the 2016 elections would have been acknowledged and condemned. Proposals would have been immediately put forth to protect our electoral processes and integrity. Laws would have been passed to ensure that USA campaigns could not look the other way when foreign intelligence agencies intervene on their behalf.
- The Supreme Court nominees would have been more moderate. Thus, rulings that clear the way for hyper-partisan Gerrymandering, and many other rulings by the conservative majority would have been avoided.
- The Republican Tax Plan would have never passed, and thus corporations and the wealthiest Americans would be paying their fair share. The national deficit would have continued to decrease rather than increase.
- There would be no tariffs and therefore no bailouts would have been necessary for our nation’s farmers.
- Our relationship with NATO Allies would still be strong and there would not be any concern from them about sharing intelligence.
- No American President would have ever referred to the American Press as ‘the enemy of the people.’
- We would be able to view our President’s full tax disclosures.
- Our sitting President would not have paid off a porn star and a Playboy Playmate, nor would the sitting President have intentionally hidden advanced business plans to build a luxury hotel in the country who waged an intelligence campaign to interfere in our elections.
- We would have actual appointed heads of government agencies, not the easily controllable ‘acting’ heads Trump has installed in many federal agencies. Betsy Devos, Bill Barr, Nick Mulvany, Wilbur Ross, Rick Perry, Alex Azar, Ben Carson, Alexander Acosta, and a whole slew of swamp creatures who allow private money interests and special interests to dictate public policy in different agencies would have been powerless on the sidelines.
- The Environmental Protection Agency would not be led by a former Coal Industry Lobbyist.
- LGBTQ Rights would still be staunchly protected.
- Transgender folks would be able to serve in the military.
- Obama era Justice Department initiatives aimed at curbing bad behavior in troubled police departments would still be intact.
- There would have been a ‘Muslim Ban.’
- Environmental regulations would still be strong and likely getting even more stringent.
- An undisclosed amount of much needed funding would not have been taken from our National Parks to fund a Trump speech on July 4th, nor would a President have ordered all other expenditures of our hard-earned tax dollars to be kept secret from us.

And the list goes on and on...
