Promises to keep: One agency’s commitment to children and families

By TOM PORTWOOD

One of the crucial community resources addressing homelessness in our area is Family Promise of Greater Modesto, a 501(c)(3) nonprofit agency specifically dedicated to helping children and families in need get back on the path to housing stability and a brighter future.

Family Promise is part of a national organization that started in New Jersey when its founder, Karen Olson, discovered the plight of families living in cars and often sleeping at night behind stores, churches, and hospitals. Through her leadership, families needing a place to stay were matched with community resources that could provide them with shelter, meals, and housing. By building community support through a network of collaborating churches and other institutions, the organization very quickly began to make a difference. Now celebrating its 30th anniversary, Family Promise has 207 affiliates nationwide and serves more than 67,000 people annually.

Locally, Family Promise has been addressing the needs of homeless families and children since 2005.

“I joined Family Promise almost five years ago,” Executive Director Tamra Losinski recently remarked. “The network was already up and running and very quietly doing some wonderful work by bringing communities and congregations from many different faiths together to work on this very important social issue – namely, child and family homelessness. We currently have about twenty congregations that work with us, Ms. Losinski added. “Some of them host and some of them participate in a supporting role. But what it looks like is that each week a congregation commits to hosting four families at their facility. We have roll away beds, each family is given a separate sleeping space, and they provide an evening meal to the families. Almost all of that is done by volunteers.”

Child Trends, a national nonprofit research group focusing on children, youth, and families reports that “children without stable homes are more than twice as likely as others to repeat a grade, be expelled or suspended, or drop out of high school.” Additionally, “a quarter or more of homeless children have witnessed violence, and more than half have problems with anxiety or depression.” Other studies indicate that homeless children are four times more likely to be sick, and twice as likely to go hungry. Family Promise is there to help put an end to this vicious cycle.

While families spend evenings at the congregation to which they have been assigned, they spend the day at the Family Promise Center at 2301 Woodland Avenue, Modesto, where they have access to a kitchen, a washer and dryer, showers, and personal lockers. While at the Center, parents work with Family Promise staff in developing a Housing Stabilization Plan while their children attend local schools.

“Day One at Family Promise is spent making sure they have a meal, a shower, and a place to sleep,” Ms. Losinski explained.

Promises to keep

“Day Two is getting the children connected to schools. That’s a big part of what we do here is to connect families to the resources that are already there, to help them in navigating through all the processes.

“We look at providing basic needs so that they can work on the plans we set up for them to help them overcome homelessness and regain their independence,” Ms. Losinski further explained. “If people have the ability to work, then we’re going to help them find work. If they have had previous barriers to housing, maybe an eviction in the past, or have bad credit, then we work with them on those issues. A big part of what we do is financial education. - teaching people how to manage the resources they have so that they can maintain their housing independence.”

Ms. Losinski was justifiably pleased to report that the network has already stepped up to cover 42 weeks in 2019. “That’s 14 people a day for seven days for 42 weeks,” she notes. “That adds up to 4,000 nights of shelter, 4,000 meals and all of that as a gift from this community and its congregations of faith!”

Additionally, Family Promise offers families experiencing homelessness two other critically-needed programs:

Rapid Rehousing – Families receive rent, security deposits, utility deposits, to help them get started in stabilizing their housing. As times goes by, the families take on more of those financial responsibilities as they gradually rebuild their independence.

Homeless Prevention Program – With funding from private and government sources, this program provides small grants to families who are on the edge of losing their existing homes. Combined with financial and tenant education, a small amount of assistance can often help families avoid homelessness altogether.

In conclusion, Ms. Losinski remarked that “Family Promise is not a religious organization and we welcome all people regardless of their beliefs, to come on board and work toward a common goal to end homelessness. Everybody deserves to have a place to live,” she stressed. “What we do is very simple, very grassroots. While these problems seem daunting and overwhelming at times, because we see homelessness far more than we did in the past, everyone can do something. Over 80% of the families who have gone through our program have moved on to some sort of more stabilized housing. By working together we can make a big impact.”

Artists Sought for State’s Game Bird Stamp Contest

The California Department of Fish and Wildlife (CDFW) is conducting an art contest to select the design for the state’s 2018-2019 upland game bird stamp.

The California Upland Game Bird Stamp Art Contest is open to all U.S. residents ages 18 and over. Entries will be accepted from Nov. 20 through Dec.7.

For contest information and entry forms, visit www.wildlife.ca.gov/upland-game-bird-stamp

This year’s stamp will feature the white-tailed ptarmigan (Lagopus leucuraI). This smallest of North American grouse species exhibits a dramatic change in plumage from a mottled or a barred brown-yellow during breeding in spring to a pure white during the winter months, allowing this chameleon of the bird world excellent camouflage on the ground year-round in its alpine habitat. In California, ptarmigan occupy the highest elevations of the Sierra Nevada from Alpine County south to Sequoia and Kings Canyon National Park.

Entries must include at least one white-tailed ptarmigan, preferably in a habitat or setting representative of California. Entries will be judged on originality, artistic composition, anatomical accuracy and suitability for reproduction as a stamp and a print.

The contest will be judged by a panel of experts in the fields of ornithology, conservation, art and printing. The winning artist will be selected during a public judging event, with the date and location to be announced.

An upland game bird validation is required for hunting migratory and resident upland game birds in California. The money generated from stamp sales must be spent on upland game bird-related conservation projects, education, hunting opportunities and outreach. CDFW sells about 175,000 upland game bird validations annually.

Any individual who purchases an upland game bird validation may request their free collectable stamp by visiting www.wildlife.ca.gov/licensing/collector-stamps. For collectors who do not purchase a hunting license or upland game bird validation, or for hunters who wish to purchase additional collectible stamps, an order form is also available on the website.

Green Tips for a Green Planet: Modesto City Schools Food Services goes compostable

By TINA ARNOPLE DRISKILL

Modesto City Schools Food Services supplies more than 20,000 meals daily. All K-8 schools plus Downey, Davis, Johansen, Modesto and Elliot High Schools are slated to use compostable serving pieces by January 2019.

The City of Modesto and Modesto City Schools have been working together over a 5-year period to implement AB 1826, which requires cities to significantly reduce landfill disposables.

Starting from the first day of school on August 13 all MCS K through 8 schools have been serving meals on compostable serving pieces. Even the spork and napkin are wrapped in a vegetable based cellophane packaging.

During the fall transition to the January goal MCS Food Services will await industry-wide back-ordered biodegradable serving supplies like straws and, return some plastics to vendors.

The good news…though the new service items will incur a significant cost of between $400 to $500 thousand dollars, these costs have been calculated over the past 5 years to work into an ongoing budget with no impact on the separate budgets for MCS staff or maintenance.

More good news: MCS works to be green nutritionally. For many years the Food Services Bakery has been using whole grain flours, has significantly lowered sodium content, and has created high fiber, low glycemic recipes.

Do the kids eat these nutritious foods? Probably so, at least those on the panel of student tasters and testers.

ACTION: Check in with your district to learn about their progress toward complying with AB 1826.

Encourage schools to go green. Example: Fremont Elementary School is fundraising for a reusable water bottle water dispenser.

Are today’s White kids less racist than their grandparents?

To explore more fully what White kids think about race, I went straight to the source: White children themselves.

By MARGARET HAGERMAN

In America’s children, we often see hope for a better future, especially when it comes to reducing racism.

Each new generation of White people, the thinking goes, will naturally and inevitably be more open-minded and tolerant than previous ones.

But do we have any reason to believe this? Should we have faith that today’s White kids will help make our society less racist and more equitable?

Previous research has had mixed findings. So to explore more fully what White kids think about race, I went straight to the source: White children themselves.

The limitations of survey data

Before beginning my research, I looked at what previous studies on the racial attitudes of young White people had found.

According to some researchers, we do have reason to be hopeful.

Using survey data, they found that young White people are expressing less prejudice than generations before them. For instance, White support for segregated schools—a traditional measure of racial prejudice—has dramatically decreased over 50 years. And surveys show that younger Whites are less likely to express racial stereotypes than older Whites.

But a second group of researchers disagreed. They found that Whites today simply articulate racial prejudice in new ways.

For example, according to national survey data, high school seniors are increasingly expressing a form of prejudice that sociologist Tyrone Forman calls “racial apathy”—an “indifference toward societal, racial, and ethnic inequality and lack of engagement with race-related social issues.”

Racial apathy is a more passive form of prejudice than explicit articulations of bigotry and racial hostility. But such apathy can nonetheless lead White people to support policies and practices that align with the same racist logic of the past, such as a lack of support for social programs and policies designed to address institutional racism or an indifference toward the suffering of people of color.

Other researchers question the ability of surveys to capture honest responses from Whites about race-related questions or to describe the complexity of Whites’ perspectives on race.

As useful as surveys can be, they don’t allow us to fully understand how White people explain, justify or develop their views on race.

What the kids said

To better understand how White children think about race, I interviewed and observed 30 affluent White families with kids between the ages of 10 and 13 living in a Midwestern metropolitan area. Over the course of two years, I immersed myself in the everyday lives of these families, observing them in public and in the home, and interviewing the parents and the kids. A few years later, when the kids were in high school, I reinterviewed a subset of the original group.

These children had some shared understandings of race, like the idea that “race is the color of your skin.” But when I brought up topics such as racism, privilege, and inequality, their responses started to diverge, and there was more variation than I anticipated.

Some kids told me that “racism is not a problem anymore.” But others told me in great detail about the racial wealth gap, employment discrimination, unequal schooling, and racist treatment of Black kids by police.

As an 11-year-old named Chris explained:

“I think that the White kids, since they have more power in general in society … disciplinary actions aren’t brought down as hard upon them. But when it’s, you know, a Black kid getting in trouble with the police … I think people are going to be tougher with them, because you know, [Black kids] can’t really fight back as well.”

Although some of the kids had much greater understandings of the history of racism in America, others flattened time and lumped all of African American history together, while also mixing up names and dates.

One 11-year-old named Natalie told me:

“Racism was a problem when all those slaves were around and that, like, bus thing and the water fountain. I mean, everything was crazy back in the olden days. … But now, I mean, since Martin Luther King and, like, Eleanor Roosevelt, and how she went on the bus. And she was African American and sat on the White part. … After the 1920s and all that, things changed.”

When it came to the understandings of privilege and inequality, some kids made comments like, “There’s no such thing [as privilege]. Everyone gets what they deserve in life, if they work for it.”

Other kids disagreed, like 11-year-old Aaron:

“I think [Whites] just kind of have the upside. … And since much of society is run by White people anyway, which is an upside, more White people are, you know, accepted into jobs, so they get the upside. So, yeah, I do think they have the upside.”

I also found that many of the children expressed forms of racial apathy. When a Black teenager was shot and killed by a police officer in the community, 16-year-old Jessica told me that she “did not care” about Black people being killed because they “obviously did something to deserve it.”

But some kids, like 16-year-old Charlotte, had a different reaction:

“It should all be stopped. There is actually a problem and a system that allowed this to happen. … Technically, legally, what that officer did was ‘OK’? It’s like, well, maybe, that’s the problem. Maybe killing Black people shouldn’t be legally ‘OK,’ you know?”

The importance of a child’s social world

Why such stark differences among these kids?

These kids weren’t simply repeating the views of their parents.

I found that their perspectives were shaped less by what their parents explicitly said about race and more by the social environments these kids grew up in—and how their parents constructed these environments.

Decisions parents made about where to live, where to send their kids to school, which extracurricular activities to enroll them in, where they traveled, and what media they consumed work to create what I refer to as a child’s “racial context of childhood.”

Within this racial context, kids developed ideas about race by observing and interpreting what was going on around them. And because of important variations in these social environments, the children made sense of race in different ways.

In this sense, my work builds on existing scholarship on how children develop understandings about race and racism in the context of family, place, early school experiences, elementary and secondary schools, child care and even summer camp.

All of these aspects of a child’s social environment play a role in shaping how they learn about race.

Are White kids less racist than their grandparents? My research with kids doesn’t give us any reason to believe that each new generation of White people will naturally or inevitably hold more open-minded and tolerant viewpoints on race than previous generations.

Dismantling racism in the United States will require more than just passive hope.

US citizens bear responsibility for the US government’s support of these crimes.

By KATHY KELLY

“If they would just confirm to us that my brother is alive, if they would just let us see him, that’s all we want. But we can’t get anyone to give us any confirmation. My mother dies a hundred times every day. They don’t know what that is like.”

In July of 2018, an Amnesty International report entitled “God Knows If He’s Alive,” documented the plight of dozens of families in southern Yemen whose loved ones have been tortured, killed, or forcibly disappeared by Yemeni security forces reporting to the United Arab Emirates (UAE). The UAE is part of the Saudi-led coalition that, with vital US support, has been bombing and blockading famine and disease-ravaged Yemen for three brutal years. The disappearances, and torture, can sadly be laid at the doorstep of the United States.

One testimonial after another echoes the sentiments of a woman whose husband has been held incommunicado for more than two years. “Shouldn’t they be given a trial?” she asked. “Why else are there courts? They shouldn’t be disappeared this way – not only are we unable to visit them, we don’t even know if they are dead or alive.”

The report describes bureaucratic farces in which families beg for information about their loved ones’ whereabouts from Yemeni prosecutors and prison officials, but the families’ pleas for information are routinely met with silence or intimidation.

The families are appealing to an unelected Yemeni exile government whose president, Abd Rabuh Mansur Hadi, (when “elected” president in 2012, he was the only candidate) generally resides in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. The UAE has, so far, supported Hadi’s claim to govern Yemen. However, the Prosecutor General of Hadi’s government, as well as other officials, told Amnesty International the government of Yemen has no control over operations “spearheaded by the UAE and implemented by the Yemeni forces it backs.”

When months and years pass and families of people who are missing still have no news about their loved ones, some try to communicate unofficially with prison guards or with former detainees who have been released from various detention sites. They repeatedly hear stories about torture of detainees and rumors about prisoners who died in custody.

The Amnesty report implicates UAE-backed local forces in Yemen, as well as the UAE military, in the crimes of torture and other ill-treatment of detainees. Of seven former or current detainees interviewed by Amnesty, five said they were subjected to these abuses. “All seven witnessed other detainees being tortured,” the report adds, “including one who said he saw a detainee held in a cell next to him being carried away in a body bag after he had been repeatedly tortured.”

In June 2017, Human Rights Watch and the Associated Press exposed a network of clandestine prisons operated by the UAE in Yemen. Their reports described ghastly torture inflicted on prisoners and noted that senior US military leaders knew about torture allegations. Yet, a year later, there has been no investigation of these allegations by the Yemeni government, by the UAE, or by the UAE’s most powerful ally in the Yemen war, the United States.

“It is shocking, to say the least,” the Amnesty report states, “that one year after a network of secret prisons operated by the UAE and the Yemeni forces it backs was exposed, these facilities continue to operate and that there has not been a serious investigation undertaken into credibly documented violations, including systemic torture in custody.” The Amnesty report calls on the US to “facilitate independent oversight, including by the US Congress, over US military or intelligence cooperation with Yemeni and UAE forces involved in detention activities in Yemen.” It further calls for investigating any involvement of US military or intelligence personnel in detention-related abuses in Yemen.

To date, the US continues selling weapons to the UAE and to its coalition partner, Saudi Arabia, despite several Congressional debates and a few increasingly close votes demanding a full or partial end to US weapons sales considering the terrible practices being carried out as part of the Yemen war.

Since March of 2015, a coalition of nine countries led by Saudi Arabia and the UAE and relying on crucial US logistical aid, has bombarded Yemen while blockading its major port, despite Yemen’s status as one of the poorest countries in the world. Targeting transportation, electrical plants, sewage and sanitation facilities, schools, mosques, weddings and funerals, the vicious bombing has led to starvation, displacement, and the spread of disease including cholera.

On the same day that the Amnesty report was released, Saudi Arabia’s Salman pardoned “all military men, who have taken part in the Operation Restoring Hope of their respective military and disciplinary penalties, in regard of some rules and disciplines.” It seems likely that the Amnesty report precipitated this royal decree.

Along with three countries in North Africa’s “Sahel” desert region, Yemen has been cited as part of the worst famine crisis in the 70-year history of the UN. In the past three years of aerial and naval attacks, Yemen’s key port of Hodeidah has remained partially or fully closed despite the country’s vital need for relief supplies. And, while Yemenis suffer the chaos and despair characteristic of war, the Saudis and UAE refer to the war as “Operation Restoring Hope.”

Many thousands of Yemenis, subjected to consistent bombing and threats of starvation and famine, have fled their homes. Many seek refuge out of Yemen. For instance, close to 500 Yemenis have traveled nearly 500 miles to reach a visa-free port on South Korea’s Jeju Island. On July 21, during an international phone call hosted by young friends in Afghanistan, listeners heard Kaia, a resident of Jeju Island, describe the “Hope School.” She explained how she and several other young people are trying to help welcome Yemenis now living in their village of Gangejong. The young people are already committed to peacefully resisting U.S. and South Korean military destruction of their shoreline and ecosystem. Now, they have started an informal school so Yemeni and South Korean residents can learn from one another. Small groups gather for conversational exchanges translated from Arabic to English to Korean. Many South Koreans can recall, in their own familial history, that seven million Koreans fled Japanese occupation of their land. Their Korean forebears relied on hospitality from people in other lands. The Catholic Bishop of the Jeju diocese, Monsignor Kang Woo-il, called on Koreans to embrace Yemeni refugees, labeling it a crime against human morality to shut the door on refugees and migrants.

Kaia’s account of the newly launched school describes an effort that truthfully involves restoring hope. The cynical designation of Saudi and UAE led war in Yemen as “Operation Restoring Hope” creates an ugly smokescreen that distracts from the crucial need to investigate war crimes committed in Yemen today.

US citizens bear responsibility for the US government’s support of these crimes.

The Yemenis mean us no harm and have committed no crime against us. Congressional votes have come quite close, with bipartisan support, to ending US participation in and support for the Saudi and Emirati led Coalition war against Yemen. Ending arms sales to the UAE and Saudi monarchies, supported by both sides of the aisle, will signal to the UAE and Saudi Arabia the US will no longer assist their efforts to prolong war and siege in Yemen. On cue from the initiative and energy shown by young South Koreans, people in the US can and should organize campaigns to educate their communities, educational institutions, and media outlets about the plight of people in Yemen. Conscious of the nightmare faced by Yemenis whose husbands, brothers, fathers and sons have been disappeared or detained by shadowy military enforcers, US people can work toward implementing each recommendation in Amnesty’s devastating report.

WHERE WAS JUSTICE?

Eighty years on
It’s the brazen chattiness of the murderers
That shocks us
Pins them in their calculated terror
Compels us to recognize our own complicity
It’s R. C. Williams who gains nobility
Who towers above his white killers
It’s to him we now turn
Begging forgiveness
Knowing the hardest work always awaits us

– Tom Portwood

Note: The Equal Justice Initiative has documented over 4,000 racial terror lynchings in twelve Southern states between the end of Reconstruction in 1877 and 1950. The same organization has also documented more than 300 racial terror lynchings in other states during this time period.

Bus Stop
The lady at the bus stop
Was anything but trash.
Our Creator blew His spirit
And she rose up from the ash.
That lady held her head in hand;
She’s troubled just like us,
But holds her worries all alone
As she awaits the bus.
Her anatomy’s esoteric;
She’s understood by all too few.
Disguised by someone’s discards,
Underneath—like me and you.
On her shoulder is a canvass bag
She found in mud knee deep.
Inside are trinkets, memories.
For her heart and soul to keep.
No one joins her on her bench,
No one offers a ride
To the lady who could be Grandma,
Whose world has up and died.
As a girl, she had a Teddy bear, a doll, a bike and toys.
She loved and laughed and sang and danced,
Knowing hugs and smiles and joys.
But the twists can oft betray us,
Not seeing we’re each a gift;
As the lady alone sits waiting
For the bus to offer a lift.

‘Bout Loving’
Leviticus tells us man can’t lie with man
And denies a true loving that is--
Simply because the man’s innermost soul
Loves a body that looks just like his.
A woman, as well, has her limits;
We tell her who must be her other.
So what if her soul connects deeply
With one who’s built just like her mother?
We’re damning the Almighty’s child
Based on her erogenous zone,
Refusing to embrace her true love
And shouting she must be alone.
A young man, he sits in the corner;
A rainbow is drawn on his face.
His neighbors, they choose to walk past him;
To them he has fallen from Grace.
The pain we inflict on our children
We say is the ruling of G-d,
But He created all children
So, rejecting them really feels odd.
I ask you to look in the mirror;
I ask you, “What do you see?”
If you don’t love the person who’s in there,
Of course, then, you cannot love me.

Not Kosher
It’s really not kosher, the way we live--
Not often honoring the words we give.
I count on you and you on me
And it worked in the world that used to be.
We had expectations and knew we could
Expect the other to act as we would.
Today, I’m saddened when friend and foe
Ignore commitments and let their vows go.
When trust is absent and truth eludes,
You wonder ‘bout my darkening moods?
In simpler times, we RSVP’d;
We helped our neighbors when they had a need.
Young and old showed up on time
And would easily part with their last dime.
We called our grandmas, respected Gramps;
Our parents were our all-time champs.
Our values have turned in downward directions;
Even first-graders discuss their erections.
The 50’s are where we all should have stayed.
I’m told to take lemons and make lemonade,
But the lemons are bitter and most are so tart.
I’ll need lots of sugar to get a good start.

Dark
The lady in the newsroom,
Post the rally in the park,
Felt the shadow in the heavens
Was a symbol of the dark.
The blanket of division
Doesn’t keep our children warm;
Rather, it propels them toward
The center of the storm.
The sun peeked back mid-morning,
But how long will she stay?
Perhaps depends upon us all
And the dance we do today.
They lined up for dark glasses
To look into the sky.
My family lined up, too, you know,
With other Jews, to die.
The lines these days ‘tween love and hate
Erase; they’re shadows, blurs.
We look away when others cry,
Ignoring painful slurs.
When will the darkness lift, you ask?
Outside, it left this morn.
Please pray that inner hate lifts, too,
Before my grandkid’s born.

The Most Disturbing Excerpts from Woodward’s New Book on Trump White House

“This is one of the most disturbing accounts of what is going on in the White House that we’ve seen yet. If one-tenth of it is accurate, we are, in a very real sense, in the midst of a national emergency.”

By JAKE JOHNSON, staff writer, Common Dreams

Bob Woodward has a book which details the first year and a half of Donald Trump’s presidency, and excerpts published by the Washington Post and CNN depict a White House in the midst of a “nervous breakdown,” sparked by a man who top aides have referred to as “an idiot,”... a “professional liar,” and “a goddamn dumbbell” who has the understanding of “a fifth- or sixth-grader.”

“He’s an idiot. It’s pointless to try to convince him of anything. He’s gone off the rails. We’re in Crazytown.”
— John Kelly, White House chief of staff

According to the Post—where Woodward has worked as a reporter and editor for decades—the “thrust” of Fear: Trump in the White House “mostly focuses on substantive decisions and internal disagreements, including tensions with North Korea as well as the future of U.S. policy in Afghanistan.”

But these substantive decisions and disagreements often produced startling moments in which the president revealed his total ignorance and lack of fitness for office.

“He’s an idiot. It’s pointless to try to convince him of anything,” White House Chief of Staff John Kelly reportedly complained during a small group meeting. “He’s gone off the rails. We’re in Crazytown. I don’t even know why any of us are here. This is the worst job I’ve ever had.”

Here are some of the most revealing and disturbing excerpts from Woodward’s book, which was published on Sept. 11.

“You don’t need a strategy to kill people.”
During a meeting last July, Trump’s national security advisers attempted to “educate” the president on foreign policy. The gathering quickly went awry, however, when Trump decided to unload on his generals for attempting to discuss Afghanistan strategy.

“Don’t testify. It’s either that or an orange jumpsuit.”
Despite Trump’s reported insistence that he would be “a real good witness” in an interview with Special Counsel Robert Mueller, the president’s former lawyer John Dowd—who resigned in March—firmly believed that Trump would commit perjury if he talked to Mueller.

According to Woodward, Dowd explained to Mueller in January that he did not want the president to do an interview because he didn’t want to “sit there and let him look like an idiot.”

The president’s attorney also worried that if a transcript of the interview leaked, as it inevitably would, people would say, “I told you he was an idiot. I told you he was a goddamn dumbbell. What are we dealing with this idiot for?”

Dowd later pleaded with Trump directly: “Don’t testify. It’s either that or an orange jumpsuit.”

“He’s this dumb Southerner”
Trump has a well-known habit of berating Attorney General Jeff Sessions in public, but according to Woodward, Trump uses far more abrasive and offensive language to ridicule Sessions behind closed doors.

“This guy is mentally retarded,” Trump said of the former Alabama senator he picked to lead the Justice Department. “He’s this dumb Southerner... He couldn’t even be a one-person country lawyer down in Alabama.”

“An administrative coup d’etat”
Reportedly alarmed by Trump’s volatile combination of ignorance and impulsiveness, Woodward reports that top White House aides devised a strategy of stealing documents from the president’s desk so he wouldn’t see or sign them.

In Woodward’s account, last spring former National Economic Council director Gary Cohn swiped “a letter off Trump’s desk” the president planned to sign that would have withdrawn the U.S. from a trade agreement with South Korea.

Cohn later told an associate that Trump never noticed the letter was missing.

THE VOTE

Why I’m betting on Millennials, this November 6th

By ROBERT REICH

Millennials (and their younger siblings, generation Z’s) are the largest, most diverse and progressive group of potential voters in American history, comprising fully 30 percent of the voting age population.

On November 6th, they’ll have the power to alter the course of American politics – flipping Congress, changing the leadership of states and cities, making lawmakers act and look more like the people who are literally the nation’s future.

But will they vote?

In the last midterm election, in 2014, only 16 percent of eligible voters between the ages of 18 and 29 bothered.

In midterms over the last two decades, turnout by young people has averaged about 38 points below the turnout rate of people 60 and older. Which has given older voters a huge say over where the nation is likely to be by the time younger people reach middle age and the older voters have passed on.

I’m not criticizing younger non-voters. They have a lot on their minds – starting jobs, careers, families. Voting isn’t likely to be high on their list of priorities.

Also, unlike their grandparents – boomers who were involved in civil rights, voting rights, women’s rights, the anti-Vietnam War movement – most young people today don’t remember a time when political action changed America for the better.

They’re more likely to remember political failures and scandals – George W. Bush lying about Saddam Hussein’s weapons of mass destruction; Bill Clinton lying about Monica; both parties bailing out Wall Street without so much as a single executive going to jail.

Most don’t even recall when American democracy worked well. They don’t recall the Cold War, when democracy as an ideal worth fighting for. The Berlin Wall came down before they were born.

Instead, during their lives they’ve watched big money take over Washington and state capitals. Which may explain why only about 30 percent of Americans born in the 1980s think it “essential” to live in a democracy.

Many young people have wondered if their votes count anyway, because so many of them live in congressional districts and states that are predictably red or blue.

Given all this, is there any reason to hope that this huge, diverse, progressive cohort of Americans will vote in the upcoming midterms?

My answer is, yes.

First, the issues up for grabs aren’t ideological abstractions for them. They’re causes in which Millennials have direct personal stakes.

Take, for example, gun violence – which some of these young people have experienced first-hand and have taken active roles trying to stop.

Or immigrant’s rights. Over 20 percent of Millennials are Latino, and a growing percent are from families that emigrated from Asia. Many have directly experienced the consequences of Trump’s policies.

A woman’s right to choose whether to have a baby, and gay’s or lesbian’s rights to choose marriage – issues Millennials are also deeply committed to – will be front and center if the Supreme Court puts them back into the hands of Congress and state legislatures.

Millennials are also concerned about student debt, access to college, and opportunities to get ahead unimpeded by racial bigotry or sexual harassment.

And they’re worried about the environment. They know climate change will hit them hardest since they’ll be on the planet longer than older voters.

They’ve also learned that their votes count. They saw Hillary lose by a relative handful of votes in places like Michigan, Wisconsin, and Pennsylvania.

They’ve been witnessing razor-thin special elections, such as Conor Lamb’s win by a few hundred votes in the heart of Pennsylvania Trump country, and Hiral Tipirneni’s single-digit loss in an Arizona district Trump won by 21 points in 2016.

They know the importance of taking back governorships in what are expected to be nail-bitingly close races – in states like Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Kansas. They’re aware of the slim but increasingly real possibility of taking back the Senate. (Who knew Ted Cruz would be so vulnerable? Who even knew the name Beto O’Rourke?)

As doubtful as they these young people are about politics, or the differences between the two parties, they also know that Trump and his Republican enablers want to take the nation backwards to an old, white, privileged, isolated America.

Most of them don’t.

In my thirty-five years of teaching college students, I’ve not encountered a generation as dedicated to making the nation better as this one.

So my betting is on them, this November 6th.
